Perhaps nothing described K-State's historic 40-30 win over Nebraska better than a large sign displayed in the student section

29 YEARS OF HELL ENDS TODAY HELL FREEZES OVER

THIS IS THE STORY OF A GOALPOST.

A goalpost that witnessed, like 44,298 other fans, Coach Bill Snyder's chance to bring the K-State football program to its greatest achievement in his 10-year career — a victory over arch rival Nebraska.

A goalpost that watched as K-State fell behind the Huskers early in Saturday's game.

A goalpost that waited for quarterback Michael Bishop to launch a pass toward the north end zone or for Martin Gramatica to sail a kick through the uprights.

A goalpost that cheered, silently, with the record-setting crowd as K-State came from behind to beat the Huskers, 40-30, for the first time since 1968.

And a goalpost that resisted, for 33 minutes, until Wildcat fans could bring it to the ground, carry it to Aggieville and celebrate a history-making victory that could help propel the Wildcats to a berth in the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl.

The goalpost earned a place of honor atop Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon in Aggieville, where it remained Sunday. The Wildcats earned the top spot — alone this week — in the USA Today/ESPN Top 25 Coaches' Poll. They kept their No. 2 ranking in the Associated Press Top 25.

"I'll remember it forever," Shawn Ward, sophomore in business, said after the victory. "There's nothing like it."

Hussein promises to comply with U.N.; some question how long resolve will last

By TERENCE HUNT
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — In a familiar outcome, President Clinton stepped back from the brink of war with Iraq after Saddam Hussein played a cheat-and-retreat game and promised again to play by the rules.

But the betting is that Hussein will turn defiant within months and interfere with U.N. weapons inspectors — as he's done about a dozen times since the Persian Gulf War.

"Candidly, I think it will be a gigantic surprise if he does comply, but I hope he does," said Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa.

Once again, the question is what happens next time. Clinton said the best long-term solution is a new Iraqi government, and he pledged to intensify support for Hussein's opponents.

After coming so close to attack, the swift White House retreat raised doubts about Clinton's threats and whether Arab nations would stick out their necks again to stand with the United States against an unpredictable Iraq.

"Our Gulf allies must be just shaking their heads at the Clinton administration," said Eliot Cohen, a professor of strategic studies at Johns Hopkins University who directed a Pentagon study of the Gulf air war. "If you're Saudi Arabia or Qatar or Bahrain, you think the Americans flinched. You wouldn't say Saddam flinched. He's had another confrontation with the United States where he gets to go back to the status quo ante without having paid for it."

"This will not be the last go round," Cohen said. "It's in Saddam's nature to keep pressing. It's in our nature, the nature of this administration, to threaten but not be sure they mean it."

David Kay, the first chief of the U.N. arms inspection team in Baghdad, said Hussein got out of this jam without making any new promises.

"This is what Iraq has been obligated to do from the very beginning and has failed to do."

"Saddam played his usual game," Kay said.

Kay said, "He played it right to the last second. He spun out of the bull's-eye and lives to fight another day. Saddam again proves he's smarter than the Americans."

The Iraqi leader triggered the showdown in August by limiting inspectors' access to suspected weapons sites. On Oct. 31, Iraq broke off cooperation.

Hussein ended the crisis simply by promising to allow the inspectors to return, backing down only as American warplanes were in the air. Iraq declared victory.

Clinton said it was the preferred outcome and called off the attack.

"Now Iraq must live up to its obligations," he said. "Until we see complete compliance, we will remain vigilant, we will keep up the pressure, we will be ready to act."

However, it is a vigilance that carries a price. The United States spent more than $1 billion in rushing military forces to the Gulf earlier this year only to stand down when Hussein retreated. The cost this time will be hundreds of millions of dollars more, plus the toll on the morale of U.S. forces and the wear and tear on equipment.

Over the last few weeks, the administration worked quietly to stitch together a coalition to isolate Hussein. It was a diplomatic victory for Clinton.

The Security Council voted 15-0 to demand that Iraq reverse course.

Women's cross country team earns bid to 1998 national championship

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If the sport of cross country had the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl, the K-State women's cross country squad would be running to Tempe, Ariz., for the national championship.

Instead of traveling to Arizona, the Wildcats earned a berth in the 1998 NCAA Cross Country Championships in Lawrence next Monday by grabbing the Midwest Regional crown in Wichita on Saturday.

With their running shoes still smoking from a first-place finish at the Big 12 Conference Championships on Oct. 31, the Cats won the title by putting two racers in the top 15 and compiling a score of 92 — 18 points ahead of Missouri and 36 in front of third place Minnesota.

"It's pretty exciting and very hard earned — a great experience for all of them," head coach Randy Cole said. "It's a combination of excitement and release."

Sophomore Brandon Jessop ran a near-perfect race to place third, qualifying for an individual spot at nationals. The Wildcat men took 10th but were only 21 points out of fifth place, a goal Cole had set for the team.

"He (Jessop) ran a very smart and beautiful race from start to finish," Cole said.

Pacing the women was sophomore Korene Hinds, who took sixth place. Right behind her in ninth place was fellow sophomore Annie Wetterhus.

"I think overall, we did okay," Wetterhus said. "We didn't run as well as we could have, but we still won."

K-State also had five racers in the top 35. Redshirt freshman Amanda Crouse and freshman Ekaterini Fotopoulou took 21 and 27, respectively. Senior Emily Diederich, running in only her second race of the season, placed 32.

Despite the Cats' winning performance, Cole said the race wasn't perfect.

"Some of our runners didn't run like they are capable of," he said. "A few people really came through, but some didn't have as good of a race as they could have had."

"It's pretty good when you're not hitting on all cylinders, and you still come up with the Midwest Regional Championship. Our girls are a talented bunch, eager to do well. That bodes well for nationals, and it bodes well for the future."

Hinds said nationals is going to be better. "I think we will be a lot stronger at nationals," she said. "It will be our last cross country meet, so we will go out and give it our all."

Champion steer earns record-setting prize

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The grand champion steer at the American Royal livestock show was sold for $75,000 Saturday, breaking a 52-year-old record by more than $30,000.

The 1,300-pound steer named Big Daddy belonged to Jeff DeRouchey, 18, a high school senior from Pukwana, S.D. Retired Kansas City businessman John Wempe and his wife, Judy, bought the animal and plan to donate it to the Kansas City Community Kitchen.

The sale broke the mark set in 1946 when Eddie Williams of the Williams Meat Co. bought the grand champion for $44,375.

The price was well above last year's $40,000 paid by Kansas City banker R. Crosby Kemper Jr.

The grand champion market lamb, named Pat, was sold for a record $11,000 to Kansas City Southern Railway. The animal was shown by Kami Ott of Fairview, Okla.

Twenty percent of the price paid for the grand champion steer goes to an American Royal scholarship fund for area students.

A percentage of the price of the 34 other steers and 21 lambs at the auction also went to the fund.

Overall, the auction raised $100,000 more than last year's Grand Champions auction.

Jones says settlement is victory for women

NEW YORK — An emotional Paula Jones said, "I feel that I have won," when asked about the settlement that ended her sexual harassment lawsuit against President Clinton.

"I think I have made an impact in the workplace, and I do believe that will prevail over any of the other things in the end," she told the syndicated television program "Inside Edition" in a two-part interview to be broadcast Wednesday and Thursday.

Some transcripts of the interview were released Saturday.

Clinton agreed Friday to pay Jones $850,000 to drop her sexual-harassment lawsuit — with no apology or admission of guilt — ending the four-year legal battle that spurred the impeachment proceedings against him.

Jones, who at one point in the interview began sobbing and stormed out of the room, said that if she could speak with Hillary Rodham Clinton, "I would just try to explain to her that, no matter who the man is, nobody can treat you like this and use you and just throw you out the door like some piece of meat."

She added that she probably wouldn't get the chance, because "... She probably hates me."

Jones is under contract not to speak to other reporters through Nov. 30.

Jones alleged that Clinton, when he was governor of Arkansas and she was a state employee, made a crude advance in a room at a Little Rock hotel in 1991.

Clinton has denied her accusation, and her lawsuit was dismissed last spring. An appeal of that dismissal was pending.

74-car pileup caused by dense fog, speed

KINGSBURG, Calif. — High speeds combined with dense fog were blamed for a 74-vehicle chain-reaction crash that killed two people and injured 51 others.

Six people, including a 7-year-old boy, remained hospitalized Sunday, one day after the mile-long pileup that left twisted heaps of cars and trucks on Highway 99 in California's Central Valley. Injuries included broken bones and burns.

The crash occurred two days after the California Highway Patrol and the state Department of Transportation issued warnings to drive cautiously as the region's fog season began.

One driver said he could see no more than 5 feet in front of him at the time of the crash.

"People continue to not respect the fog, even people born and raised here,"

CHP spokesman Mark Walker said. "I feel sorry for people traveling from out of the area who end up in this mess."

Authorities in northern Tulare County said the carnage could have been worse had fellow motorists not braved fire to pull victims from nearly unrecognizable cars and trucks.

The pileup, about 180 miles southeast of San Francisco, closed about 25 miles of southbound highway for nearly 12 hours.

Since 1990, 11 people have died in four significant fog-related pileups on Highway 99.

Victims of Saturday's crash were not immediately identified.

Israeli leaders call Arafat's comments 'declaration of war on peace process'

By NICOLAS B. TATRO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

JERUSALEM — Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat hinted Sunday at armed conflict with Israel, warning that "our rifle is ready" and reiterating that he will declare statehood next year.

David Bar-Illan, a senior adviser to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, said that Arafat's comments were a "declaration of war on the peace process." Bar-Illan said that Netanyahu "views such statements with the utmost severity" and would bring them up when his Cabinet meets later this week.

The escalation of rhetoric came as U.S. envoy Dennis Ross sought to jumpstart the latest Middle East peace accord.

In the West Bank, a Jewish settler was injured slightly in a drive-by shooting close to Palestinian-held territory. Shlomo Dror, a spokesman for Israel's liaison unit to the Palestinians, blamed the shooting on Palestinian militants bent on derailing the peace process.

"There are some Palestinians there who want to stop this process," said Dror, who also said the Israeli army was searching the area.

Soldiers and protesters also clashed when a group of Palestinians tried to prevent a bulldozer from beginning work on a bypass road for Jewish settlers. The road will require the confiscation of 40 acres of Arab land in al-Khader, near Bethlehem.

About 30 soldiers beat back 20 protesters, who responded with a hail of stones.

Soldiers shot rubber bullets and tear-gas canisters into the crowd. Two Palestinians were treated for tear-gas inhalation, including Palestinian lawmaker Salah Tamari, and one Israeli soldier also was injured.

Ross met with Israeli officials and with negotiators from both sides. Palestinian officials, speaking on a condition of anonymity, said the three-way meeting produced a loose timetable for implementation this week.

Committees dealing with economics, a Palestinian safe-passage route and seaport are to begin meeting today and Tuesday. On Wednesday, the sides open critical final status talks. Thursday, the Palestinians will be shown Israel's withdrawal maps and by the end of Friday, Israel will have pulled its troops from an initial 2 percent of land.

Earlier, Ross urged moving Sunday's public debate off the airwaves and to the negotiating table.

"One thing that is key: It is always better for the two sides to talk to each other instead of at each other," Ross told reporters after meeting with Israeli Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon.

The deal calls for Israel to withdraw from an additional 13 percent of the West Bank in exchange for stepped-up Palestinian security measures.

Sharon said that Arafat's comments made it difficult to conduct negotiations and reiterated that Israel would annex the areas of the West Bank it holds if Arafat declares a Palestinian state.

Palestinian officials indicated Arafat's strong language came in response to Israeli annexation threats and as a result of the delay in implementing the withdrawal agreement. The first pullback had been slated for today, but Israel said it would be delayed for several days.

Speaking to members of his Fatah faction in the West Bank town of Ramallah, Arafat said, "Our rifle is ready, and we are ready to use it if they try to delay us from praying at al-Aqsa (the holiest mosque in Jerusalem)."

Defying Israel and the United States, who have urged him to drop the demand, Arafat said: "We will declare our state on May 4 next year. This is our right."

Netanyahu countered that Arafat's comments cast a "very dark shadow" over the peace process.

During a radio address Sunday, Arafat sought to allay Israeli fears of an independent Palestinian state, saying it will be the "bridge of love and peace."

Arafat coupled his appeal with a warning to Islamic militants and their supporters in the Arab world that he would not tolerate interference.

"We are not going to allow anyone to attack our dream and to destroy our Palestinian national project," he said, also saying that terror attacks only would provide Israel with an excuse to back out of the agreement to hand over land.

After attacks attributed to Islamic militants on an Israeli school bus and a Jerusalem market, Netanyahu delayed the timetable for implementing the land-for-security accord.

Emporia high school educator chosen as teacher of the year

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA — Carol Strickland, an English and speech teacher at Emporia High School, is Teacher of the Year in Kansas for 1999.

It was the second straight year an Emporia educator has won the honor. Darla Mallein, who teaches American history at Emporia Middle School, was Teacher of the Year last year.

Strickland's selection was announced Saturday night by state Education Commissioner Andy Tompkins to about 300 educators and business officials attending the annual dinner of the Teacher of the Year program.

She was presented a $4,000 check by Kris Robbins, president and chief operating officer of Security Benefit Group of Companies of Topeka.

Robbins said the company plans to commit up to $28,000 in financial assistance to become the main sponsor of the statewide program in 1999 — including four regional dinners and cash awards to the eight state finalists.

Strickland also received a lifelong learning scholarship from the state Board of Regents, a computer from Apple Computer Inc. and a Jostens Leader in Education ring.

All eight finalists received a $250 classroom grant from Southwestern Bell Foundation, an IBM Corp. classroom-professional development grant and a $2,000 cash award as recipients of the Nancy Landon Kassebaum annual award for excellence in teaching.

"Kansas education is certainly honored to have Carol as its teacher of the year," Tompkins said. "Her dedication to education is matched by her love for our youth. It's easy to see that not only is Carol a role model for excellent teaching, but she's an inspiration to everyone as she demonstrates her passion for kids every day."

Other finalists were F. Gene Hampton, Shawnee Mission South High School, ninth and 10th grade biology teacher; Alicia Jackson, Uniontown High School, English and Spanish teacher; Sandra Morris, Royal Valley Elementary School, first and second grade reading teacher; Sherry Nelson, Sunflower Elementary School, Lawrence, fifth grade classroom teacher; Cynthia Schaker, Towanda Grade School, seventh grade social studies and mathematics teacher; Shirley Stein, Sullivan Elementary School, Ulysses, fifth grade classroom teacher, and Sue Wilson, Derby Sixth Grade Center, science and math teacher.

Interest rates to drop on student loans

■ Reauthorization allows students to consolidate.

By AMANDA LEVIN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Reauthorization of the Higher Education Act of 1965 has brought a window of opportunity for lower interest rates for students.

As of July 1, the new rate for loans to students who are in school is 6.86 percent, a reduction of 0.8 percent. Students out of school will receive a lowered interest rate of 7.46 percent.

The reauthorization also has allowed for a time-sensitive window of opportunity for students to consolidate their loans at one low-interest rate of 7.46 percent.

"This gives students the convenience of consolidating to one loan at one interest rate rather than several loans with several different interest rates," said Robert Gamez, associate director for operations at the Department of Student Financial Assistance.

There are two different loan types for K-State students, Gamez said. One is the Stafford Loan and the other is the Federal Direct Loan. Only students who are in school and have only Federal Direct Loans can consolidate under the new interest rate offered by the reauthorization.

Graduates also can take advantage of the opportunity with the exception that they can consolidate any type of loan. This is a time-limited benefit; students have until Jan. 30, 1999, to consolidate their loans.

"When interest rates drop, many people have the chance to refinance their debt obligations. Now with the consolidation opportunity, the interest-rate savings is being passed on to students to take advantage of in the limited time, so students need to act fast," SFA director Larry Moeder said.

Students can benefit by saving, on average, $50 for every $1,000 they have in loans. There is no minimum or maximum amount in loans a student has to have, no fee to consolidate the loans, and students can choose from a wide variety of repayment methods.

Students can go to the Department of Education World Wide Web site at www.ed.gov/directloan or call (800) 557-7392 to get more information or start the consolidation process. The process will take between 60 and 80 days to complete.

The reauthorization also brought an increase in Pell Grant assistance, Moeder said. The increase sets the direction for a steady increase for the next five years. The financial aid process also was changed.

"The reauthorization has now increased benefits and given regulatory relief to students and staff in the financial aid process," Moeder said.

Variety of activities shows diversity of culture

By LYNETTE ABITZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sounds of India filled the Manhattan High School East Campus Sunday evening as part of the India Students Association India Nite.

Vineet Gill, president of the India Students Association, said the event was more than a chance for Indians to get together.

"This is how we show people from other cultures that there is unity and diversity in our culture," he said. "It's a window of opportunity to look into our culture."

Gill said the night also was a chance for Indians to reflect back on their roots. "We can enjoy the festivity of being different," he said.

Guests began the evening with an authentic India dinner consisting of Aaloo gobi, cauliflower and potato; paneer palak, spinach and cheese; ton-doori chicken, similar to American smoked chicken; pulav, rice with peas and carrots; and nan, bread. Vegetarians could eat samosa, nan stuffed with potatoes and peas. Kheer, a sweet rice pudding, was served for dessert.

Indian crafts were displayed. Some guests were amazed by a man, who with the flick of his wrist, released a top from the yarn it was wrapped in. Others looked at bracelets and bindi, a small jewel placed in the middle of the forehead of women.

Nikhil Kashyap, graduate student in electrical engineering, said the bindi adds to the women's beauty. He also said women don't wear a traditional wedding band, but they place a red powder on the edge of their hairline to symbolize they are married.

A sample setting for traditional ceremonies also was displayed. Kashyap said there is much color in the setting, and the fire on the stand is good. Light shining in a person's home represents prosperity, he said.

The crowd exuded the most excitement during the cultural presentation that featured songs, dance, a show of traditional clothing and a marriage ceremony.

The fashion show presented traditional dress from different areas of India, showing the diversity of the country.

"We are trying to represent India as a whole," Kashyap said. "India has a very diverse culture."

Joe Handlos, a rural Milford, Kan., resident, said he attended the festivities because of his son's relationship with an Indian student at K-State. Handlos enjoyed the marriage ceremony the most.

"I liked that divorce is taboo and all the symbolism involved," he said. "You can see why they have such a strong family unit in India."

Gill said the India Students Association has the event each year. There will be a larger festival in the spring, he said.

OUR VIEW

K-State fans, players show true character

Soon enough the buzz from this weekend's football game will die down a bit, fans will lose the smiles of satisfaction they have been carrying since Saturday night, and everything will return to normal.

For the time being, though, the goalpost probably is still on the top of Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon in Aggieville, and you probably still are buzzing from all of the excitement of Saturday. You probably are thinking about getting tickets to the Big 12 Conference championship game in St. Louis, or possibly, you are marveling about how we have come so far and what it means that we are recognized by many now as the nation's No. 1 team.

After the win, athletic commentators were remarkably affable, showing uncharacteristic warmth to K-State after the victory. That K-State was on everybody's mind Saturday night is a clear sign that we've arrived. There is no doubt that we gained some converts from The Associated Press pollsters. We have achieved a level of national prominence unparalleled in K-State history.

We also would like to point out that with the exception of the goalpost, a trampled fence and several road signs, there was little property damage surrounding the victory. The crowd never got too far out of control — even in Aggieville after the game, the mood was festive and relaxed, which was remarkable considering the subdued police presence.

The Riley County Police Department was exceptionally accommodating, allowing the group and its goalpost to travel to Aggieville unhampered, diverting traffic for them — or, diverting them for traffic. Either way, the same holds true. The police were unobtrusive and relatively affable.

In light of that, the editorial board felt it would be appropriate to reflect a bit on the game.

Part of our victory is due to how well-confined Nebraska fans were. For all of the discussion on students selling tickets to the other side, in the end, it seemed as though most K-Staters stayed loyal. As a result, Nebraska was corralled into pockets on the north and south sides of KSU Stadium. Its presence was limited, and in the end, that worked in our favor. We would like to thank K-State students and patrons for preventing any sort of Red incursion.

By doing so, our dominance over the Cornhuskers was asserted in the stands and on the field.

It was the first time this year that the crowd really felt like an important factor in the game. The halftime score left us feeling dejected and angry. After all, it also was the first time this year that we were behind by any significant amount.

At that point, the situation was dire.

While we had complained about failing to get national recognition, the truth was that unless we were winning by 40 points, we didn't quite trust ourselves, either.

What happened during halftime is uncertain, but a rallying cry rose up from a few members of the crowd, and all of a sudden we were back in the game.

The answering rally by the Wildcats helped to build up a second-half momentum that ended with the loudest fan participation that Wagner Field has seen. The Husker fans had to resign themselves to sitting quietly, since the best of their cheering paled in comparison to ours.

The uproar was deafening, and the charisma the players showed reflected the crowd's excitement. Had we not been able to recover as well as we did after halftime, the defense could not have achieved as much as they did, and the result of the game could have been different. It was a much better game because the crowd didn't give up — the 12th man couldn't give up. To do so would be to admit defeat.

And we won.

To a certain extent, it seems as though the crowd helped lead the team to victory, and the team helped lead the crowd to the goalpost.

So now we need to deal with the fact that we are peaking. K-State is riding its accomplishments in football and academics to the top of collegiate achievement. Two things decide whether we will stay there. We must remember to work hard.

Also, we must remember who we are — the loudest, most enthusiastic, most talented and dignified school in the country — in more than football.

IT'S THE END

OF THE WORLD

AS WE KNOW IT AND

I FEEL FINE

VIEWPOINT

MARY VANLEEUWEN

So the end of the world is coming. Yada, yada, yada.

There's always some so-called expert around with a prediction at hand. I think most people would rather not know how they're going to kick the bucket of chicken. Personally, I'd like to die from a hit-and-run. However, mention The End of the World and people are all over the topic like maggots on a rotting deer carcass, or at least the people who regularly write and read the Weekly World News are.

I think credit-card companies are behind the whole thing. This is my theory: These companies hire fruits off the street to become world-renowned psychics, scientists or clergy who claim they know when the world will end. Then, all the gullible folks in the world charge, charge, charge with their credit cards, because they know that if life ceases to exist, so do credit-card payments.

After the Dreaded Day of Death passes and the chargers still are snuggled safely in their beds, the cardholders are stuck with debt and worthless possessions of happiness, and the card companies are smoking cigars and saying things like "Whoo-wee! Mama's bringin' home the bacon!" — whatever that means. When the year 2000 rolls around, these companies will be rolling in the metaphoric pork products.

Once a month, a tabloid features a "Life Nips it in the Bud" article of sorts, and I'm sure credit-card companies hired the men featured in last week's edition of Weekly World News, which was playing off the upcoming millennium and claiming world destruction in 2000. Holy moly! We're going to die! I saw this on the cover and had to investigate a bit further so I could warn you, the reader, of this upcoming disaster.

Father Benito Pontelli, papal adviser, Citibank carrier and psychic to the stars, saw the current Washington, D.C., sex scandal as "the final sign that the end is near." OK, I don't know how long people have been performing kinky sex acts, but I know that Monica Lewinsky and Billy-boy aren't the first. Sexual promiscuity and the presidency go hand in hand. It's not like President Clinton was the first president or person to cheat on a spouse. What makes his affair so scandalous that it causes Armageddon?

The Rev. Hershel Darminger, Visa Gold man, falls on the Bible reminding us that it prophesies wars, pestilence and earthquakes before the big kaboom. Seems to me that humans have been fighting against each other since the beginning of patriarchal societies. People have been starting wars in God's name for centuries.

Killer bees will be killer bees, and earthquakes definitely aren't a new weird phenomenon marking the end. Give me a break, Hershel,

Daniel Clegstein, American Express holder, claims the world will be uninhabitable by the year 2000 due to environmental problems. While I believe that the decaying environment we keep dumping our power-hungry attitudes on inevitably will lead to our downfall, I don't see how anyone can make such a prediction for the year 2000.

Benjamin A. Kingsford, Discover doofus, blames the economy. He said there's a 99.9-percent chance that the end will be caused by economic tension across the world. People talk about the fall of the world economy almost more than they talk about D-Day.

I've seen an influx of these predictions in the last decade — and not just on the cover of tabloids. Psychics used to pick out random dates and hope they were right. Now, everyone has pinpointed the year 2000.

I wonder if people did this in the year 999. I wonder if credit agencies existed back then. I wonder if we'll ever just quit caring about the end and enjoy the present. I wonder if I will ever stop being amused by Armageddon predictions.

Doubt it.

Evening with fellow Collegian columnists surprisingly sane

VIEWPOINT

CORBIN H. CRABLE

I never thought I'd be so excited to have dinner with Sam Sackett.

I'd been waiting for a good three weeks to do so; the Collegian columnists' "night out" last week had me pumped for some stimulating conversation, to say the least. We went to 12th Street Pub in Aggieville, thanks to the suggestion of a few excited columnists, for an evening of winning and dining (OK, just dining; one of us drank skim milk and the rest drank Coke, so the winning part was nonexistent).

With the great variety of viewpoints and belief systems among the columnists, I was sure this would prove to be an evening of powerful discussions, some of which would lead to the occasional mud-slinging and/or fist fight. Basically, I was expecting some confrontations worthy of "The Jerry Springer Show." I wanted to hear the viewpoints of my fellow partners-in-crime from their own mouths, for once, and not just read about them every day. This "getting to know you" event was going to be the perfect chance for issues to be brought up and debated.

Actually, the exact opposite happened. To my dismay, there was no arguing, there were no hurtful words exchanged. I know, I'm cruel, but admit it — it would make for an interesting evening.

Instead, the Collegian columnists, whose wacky anecdotes you read every morning, actually (gasp) bonded!

Cue music from "The Twilight Zone" theme, please.

I was disappointed at first that no significant issues or topics were brought up, but by the main course, everyone was having a good time discussing our favorite B-movies. The topics for the evening ranged from cows (courtesy of that bovine-lovin' stud, Ken Wells) to gossip about fellow Collegianites (ah, sweet blackmail) to debate on the mating habits of the South African dung beetle (by that time, we had long since run out of interesting topics for discussion).

Sitting down to dine with my fellow cohorts, I found them to be somewhat different than how they present themselves in their writings. Todd Pacey was the most silent in the group, a far cry from the usual rambling he does in his columns; Wells, ever the lover o' cows, was the only person not to purchase a hamburger, instead opting for the buffalo wings (at least it's still livestock), and good ol' Sackett laughed at everything I said.

I wasn't expecting either of us to act in such a civilized manner, and it pleasantly surprised me. I even confessed to Sackett that my parents read his columns religiously (no pun intended), and they enjoy his writings very much. Being one who disagrees with almost everything Sackett has to say, it was painful to admit that my parents enjoyed the writings of a total stranger more than those of their own son.

Everyone's behavior surprised me, to say the least. I went into the evening expecting to be caught in the middle of a bloodbath and instead was involved in a decent conversation.

OK, here goes the "We are the World" feel-good part of my column.

If several columnists with different viewpoints and beliefs can come together over dead cow on a bun and talk to one another without worry, then why can't everyone else do the same? All it takes is a little motivation. Personally, I'm going to try it again very soon.

Fred Phelps and I are going to play tennis next week. Wish me luck.

Starr to present case Thursday

■ Starr's motives, actions of president will be focus of committee hearing.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — For the first time in his four-year investigation, Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr publicly will lay out his case against President Clinton in a congressional forum torn apart by partisan politics.

Starr's motives and tactics, as well as the president's actions, will be the focus of a House Judiciary Committee hearing scheduled for Thursday.

Democrats plan to portray Starr as a right-wing prosecutor on a rampage against Clinton, in concert with the president's political opponents. For Republicans, the hearing represents Starr's best opportunity to make his case forcefully against Clinton.

In his impeachment report to the House, Starr accused the president of 11 offenses that he considers impeachable and alleged a pattern of lies by Clinton and his loyalists in the Monica Lewinsky case.

Former Iran-Contra prosecutor Lawrence Walsh, a strong critic of Starr for pursuing the Lewinsky allegations, said, "I think his actions deserve all the scrutiny he's getting, but I'm not at all sure Starr won't do well."

"The sympathy of the public during a televised hearing is with the witness. ... I think of the appearance of Oliver North, who ran away with the congressional hearing in Iran-Contra."

Starr is no stranger to tough questions in a tense environment. As President Bush's solicitor general, he took them for years from Supreme Court justices. Nonetheless, he is vulnerable on several points:

—He aggressively investigated the Lewinsky matter before getting formal authorization from the Justice Department, having Lewinsky's friend, Linda Tripp, wear a body wire Jan. 13 to record a conversation with the former intern. Starr could defend the action as fully within his discretion as a prosecutor, even though Attorney General Janet Reno didn't approve an expansion of Starr's mandate until Jan. 16.

—When Starr's prosecutors confronted Lewinsky on Jan. 16, she asked to speak to her lawyer. Fearful that targets of their probe might be tipped off, Starr's investigators told Lewinsky any deal for immunity from prosecution was null and void if she called her attorney. Justice Department regulations say a person's lawyer must be present for discussions involving an immunity deal.

—Tripp, the prosecutor's star witness who triggered the Lewinsky probe by secretly taping the former intern's admissions of a presidential affair, also is facing scrutiny. Starr is probing whether her tapes were tampered with and whether Tripp lied about them when she testified the tapes she turned over to prosecutors were originals. The FBI has concluded some of the tapes are, in fact, duplicates.

—After working with Starr's office, Tripp provided specifics about Lewinsky's relationship with Clinton to Paula Jones' lawyers who then caught the president off-guard with detailed questions when he testified Jan. 17 in the lawsuit. Democrats wonder why Starr's office didn't do as prosecutors frequently do in sensitive criminal investigations and stop Tripp from talking to outsiders. Some Democratic critics have suggested Starr might have tried to entrap the president.

Problems loom on other fronts, too.

The president's lawyers persuaded a federal judge to launch a probe of leaks of secret grand-jury information. Starr's office denies it broke grand-jury secrecy rules, but U.S. District Judge Norma Holloway Johnson has concluded that there's enough superficial evidence of possible leaks — 24 news stories in all — that she appointed a special master to investigate further.

If the judge finds that Starr's office violated grand-jury secrecy rules, she could ask Reno to remove him from office, refer any leakers to the American Bar Association for discipline or take other action.

There is a separate investigation of Starr's office by former Justice Department lawyer Michael Shaheen into whether money from foundations controlled by conservative billionaire Richard Mellon Scaife found its way into the pocket of David Hale, a crucial Starr witness against Clinton in the original Whitewater inquiry.

The suspicion that Starr has a political agenda first arose in 1994.

Appeals Court Judge David Sentelle met with Republican Sens. Jesse Helms and Lauch Faircloth around the time that Sentelle and two other appeals court judges appointed Starr prosecutor. Faircloth had been outspoken in demanding that Starr's predecessor, Robert Fiske, be replaced. Sentelle said that he, Faircloth and Helms did not discuss politics at their luncheon meeting.

Starr also had conversations with Paula Jones' lawyers before becoming independent counsel. The two sides discussed the constitutional question of whether an incumbent president is immune to civil suit. Starr said he wasn't.

The prosecutor didn't disclose the discussions to the Justice Department when he got permission to investigate possible crimes committed by the president in the Jones case. Starr says there was no conflict and therefore no need to disclose.

Black militant leader dies of cancer

Ture made 'black power' a rallying cry for civil rights

By DEBRA HALE SHELTON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Kwame Ture, who as Stokely Carmichael made the phrase "black power" a rallying cry of the civil-rights upheavals of the 1960s, died Sunday in Guinea, a member of Ture's All-African People's Revolutionary Party said. He was 57.

Sharon Sobukwe, a member of the organization in Philadelphia, said that Ture died of prostate cancer. She learned of his death from Amadou Ly, an AAPRP member and one of Ture's closest friends, who was with him when he died.

The Rev. Jesse Jackson said that he had visited with Ture three times at his home in Guinea during a trip to Africa last week.

"In many ways, he was at peace with himself," Jackson said in a telephone interview from Washington. "He wanted for his last days to be in Guinea and in West Africa. ... He wanted to be among the people of Africa."

"He was one of our generation who was determined to give his life to transforming America and Africa. He was committed to ending racial apartheid in our country. He helped to bring those walls down."

Ture was diagnosed with prostate cancer in 1996. A self-described socialist, he was treated in Cuba and received financial help for his treatment from Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan.

As the young Carmichael, he was among the most fiery and visible leaders of black militancy in the United States in the 1960s, first as head of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and then as prime minister of the Black Panther Party.

He cut his ties with the American groups over the issue of allying with white radicals and moved to Guinea in 1969. There, with a new name taken from the African leaders Kwame Nkrumah and Ahmed Sekou Toure, he organized the new party.

For the rest of his life, both overseas and in appearances in front of largely black audiences at U.S. colleges, he continued preaching black power and championing socialism while condemning America, capitalism and Zionism.

Born in Trinidad on June 29, 1941, and raised there and in New York, Ture described himself as a pliant acceptor of white dominion while growing up.

He recalled in a 1967 interview in the London Observer that as a boy in the Trinidad capital of Port-of-Spain, he and his black schoolmates "went to the movies and yelled for Tarzan to beat the hell out of Africa."

"I'm angry, because I didn't rebel," he said.

In 1960, he enrolled at Howard, a predominantly black university in Washington, D.C., where he received a degree in philosophy and plunged into the civil-rights revolution.

In a time when black college students were being beaten and arrested for daring to sit at whites-only Southern lunch counters, Carmichael joined the first freedom rides — bus trips aimed at desegregating public transportation — and suffered the first of what was to be about three dozen jailings when he reached Mississippi.

As an SNCC field organizer there later, he led a perilous voter registration effort that raised black enrollment from 70 to 2,600 in Lowndes County, 300 more than the white registration.

Ture is survived by his wife, his mother, three sisters and two sons.

Services in the United States, Africa, Britain and the Caribbean will be organized by the AAPRP, the group said.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After 10 years of building and crafting, the Bill Snyder master plan came full circle Saturday.

With a 40-30 victory over the former bully of the Big 12 Conference, Nebraska, K-State got its first 10-0 start in school history and earned a guaranteed spot in the Big 12 Championship game after a Missouri loss earlier to Texas A&M.

In a bloody contest that offensive lineman Jeremy Martin described as a 15-round prize fight, the knockout blow wasn't delivered until defensive end Joe Bob Clements jarred the ball loose from NU quarterback Eric Crouch with 15 seconds remaining, allowing linebacker Jeff Kelly to recover the ball and rumble 23 yards for the final touchdown of the afternoon.

The touchdown ignited a premature celebration, as fans rushed the field with three seconds remaining — the first of two early rushes for the goal posts. Once the ensuing kickoff was over, the floodgates of nearly three decades of frustration opened, and Wagner Field was transformed into a sea of purple celebration.

At the center of the celebration was quarterback Michael Bishop, who improved his record as starting quarterback in college and community college to 45-1.

Bishop was nearly the martyr for the

His final touchdown pass to receiver Darnell McDonald with 5:25 remaining put K-State up 34-30 and proved to be the winning touchdown.

"Mike played well. He was motivated for this ball game and he stayed tough," Coach Snyder said. "Sometimes turnovers can rattle a player, but he han-

"I'm happy. I can assure you of that," Snyder said, referring to his state of emotion following the victory. "I feel very good about this win. I'm humbled by it, in all honesty, because of how long it took."

For the majority of the game, however, a goalpost celebration seemed to be in jeopardy. The Cornhuskers scored on their initial possession and forced K-State to come from behind twice in the game.

"We have not had to come back from behind this year," Snyder said. "I'm not sure we've had to come from significantly behind before with this group of players."

K-State was down 14-7 midway through the second quarter when Nebraska appeared ready to add another touchdown after a pass to Shevin Wiggins set up a first-and-goal at the

McDonald's final score ends senior's career day

By NICK BRATKOVIC

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With 5:29 left in the fourth quarter, K-State trailed Nebraska, 30-27.

Fans at KSU Stadium were nervous as national-championship aspirations, along with K-State's hope of dethroning Nebraska, hinged in the balance.

They began to wonder who would step up to end the 29 years of Big Red dominance.

Four seconds later, two players answered the purple prayers.

Running a pattern the Cats have worked on all season, quarterback Michael Bishop was forced out of the pocket by the Nebraska defense. On the move, Bishop hit receiver Darnell McDonald, who was waiting, wide open, in the back of the end zone, for the go-ahead score and eventual game winner.

In the huddle on the final drive, McDonald said Bishop was focused and talked about winning the game for the fans.

"He said, 'Let's score, and help the fans tear down the goalpost,'" McDonald said.

On the go-ahead drive's final play, McDonald said it felt like the ball took an eternity to get there. After the play, McDonald said Bishop shared his thoughts preceding the touchdown catch.

"He said he was praying I wouldn't drop it," McDonald said. "I said I was, too."

Offensive Coordinator Ron Hudson said his team's attention to detail during the week made the play that much more effective.

"All week long I've said, 'Guys, when we get inside the 10-yard line, we're gonna call a particular pattern,'" Hudson said, referring to the touchdown pass to McDonald. "Sure enough, there was Darnell in the back of the end zone."

K-State head coach Bill Snyder said that after a couple of early drops, McDonald told him he would return to form.

"He struggled a little bit on a couple of occasions," Snyder said. "About halfway through the first quarter, he said, 'Coach, you can count on me,' and I appreciated that, because I have been kind of hard on Darnell."

McDonald finished the game with a career-best 12 receptions for 183 yards. More importantly, his receptions came at critical times in the game.

After making a reception in the second quarter, McDonald used a variety of moves to battle his way to the Nebraska 1-yard line. The play set up one of Bishop's two touchdown runs. On another, he juked a defender, spun around another and managed to stay on his feet for his first touchdown of the game.

"That's what this ballgame is all about — making plays," Snyder said, "and we had some youngsters step up and make plays."

After the game, McDonald said he was overcome with emotion.

"I really wanted to surf back to the locker room through the fans," he said, "but then I thought I'd get in trouble for that."

Cats able to mount comeback to turn tables on Cornhuskers

By JOHN BERGGREN

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At times, it looked like K-State's 29-game losing streak to Nebraska was going to be extended Saturday.

The Wildcats hadn't been in a close game all season long, winning each of their first nine games by an average of 44.7 points. Waiting to pull out a victory in the fourth quarter kept the 44,298 fans packed in KSU Stadium and countless more viewing on television on the edge of their seats until the final minutes of the game.

K-State fell behind early when Nebraska tight end Sheldon Jackson capped the game's opening drive with an 8-yard reception from quarterback Eric Crouch, marking the first time the Wildcats had trailed in a game since falling behind 3-0 to Syracuse in the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl last New Year's Eve.

The Wildcats managed to tie the game at 7-7 in the first quarter, but they fell behind again in the second and went into halftime trailing 17-14.

Trailing at the half was another feat the purple faithful weren't used to. K-State hadn't trailed at intermission since trailing Nebraska 20-6 last season at Lincoln before losing 56-26. However, tight end Justin Swift said K-State's players weren't worried about history repeating itself.

"When you play Nebraska, you know it's going to be a 15-round fight, and it's going to go the distance," Swift said. "It's a long game, but we never got worried. We just concentrated on coming back."

The Wildcats finally took their first lead in the game with 8:20 left in the third quarter, when Darnell McDonald slipped out of coverage into the back of the end zone and was wide open for a touchdown reception to go up 21-17.

Yet K-State still wasn't able to control the game like it had all season.

Cats' 4-yard line.

However, the defense halted three rushing attempts and forced the Huskers to kick an 18-yard field goal — a stand that defensive coordinator Mike Stoops said might have reversed K-State's fortunes.

"I think that was the play of the game," Stoops said. "We were a little too emotional right off the get-go. We weren't concentrating on our assignments. Once we got in a groove, I thought we played a little bit better."

K-State responded by covering 76 yards in less than a minute, capping the drive with a 1-yard touchdown plunge by Bishop that brought the Cats within three, 17-14.

After taking a 21-17 lead early in the third quarter, the Cats' defense held NU to a three-and-out series to force another punt. David Allen received the punt at the K-State 40-yard line and returned it for 48 yards to the Nebraska 12 before being forced out of bounds. Already tied for the NCAA record for most punt-return touchdowns in a season, Allen nearly notched his fifth and set up the K-State offense with another scoring opportunity.

However, running back Frank Murphy, who was filling in for Eric Hickson after the senior left with a leg injury, was thwarted at the 8-yard line, leaving Martin Gramatica with a 25-yard field goal that put K-State up 24-17.

A Jeff Kelly interception late in the third quarter set the Cats up at the Nebraska 31, leaving the offense with the opportunity to enter the final quarter with a two-touchdown lead. On the first play of the drive, however, Murphy coughed up the ball and cornerback Ralph Brown returned the fumble 74 yards for the equalizing touchdown as the third quarter expired.

K-State regained the lead with a 21-yard Gramatica field goal, but Nebraska answered with a 9-yard touchdown pass from Crouch to tight end Sheldon Jackson that put the Huskers up 30-27.

NU kicker Kris Brown missed the extra point, ending a streak of 125 straight. After K-State regained the lead for good, the defense ended the Huskers' drive on their own 32-yard line when Crouch was sacked by linebacker Travis Ochs. Although it appeared Ochs grabbed Crouch's face mask, no flags were dropped, and the Cats took over.

"I got face-masked. I thought it was a penalty," Crouch said. Although unhappy with the non-call, Crouch said the K-State defense was one of the best the Huskers have seen this season.

"They played hard and physical and with a lot of heart," he said. "I knew it was going to be a war out there."

With the final score reflecting the end of one streak, the Cats continued another, adding to their school-record 18-game winning streak and moving one step closer to a berth in the Bowl Championship Series title game.

While the progression toward an undefeated season remained important, Stoops said silencing critics who doubted K-State could beat Nebraska was even better.

"It means everything to us," he said. "We're tired of them saying we're still Kansas State."

"They came into our house. We wanted to protect what we've accomplished here at Kansas State, and our kids responded like champs."

a touchdown to tie the game at 24 in the final minute of the third quarter. Crouch later hit Jackson for another touchdown midway through the fourth quarter to pull ahead for the third time in the game, 30-27.

"We still weren't worried," defensive end Joe Bob Clements said. "We still had confidence on the sideline. We knew we were only down by 3 points."

The Wildcats went the distance and scored on an 11-yard pass from Bishop to McDonald for a 34-30 lead with 5:25 remaining. That, Clements said, sealed the game for good.

"You could just see it in the eyes of our defense," he said. "We weren't going to let them have anything from that point on."

Playing in a close game for the first time all season proved a lot to not only the Wildcats, but to the entire nation, receiver Aaron Lockett said.

"No one was going to believe much of us until we won a game like this," Lockett said. "It wasn't pretty, but it was an exciting one for the fans, and we came out with a win."

"We showed a lot of character today," he said. "A lot of people doubted us for not being in any close games, but we proved that we can play with good teams and still pull out wins after we get behind."

Starters return to court

Decision to play Griffin comes in warmups

By JON BALMER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After a week of seemingly nothing but bad news, the men's basketball team received a welcomed dose of good news with the return of guards Chris Griffin and Josh Reid on Friday.

The team coasted to an 83-60 victory against Saint Mary's at Bramlage Coliseum.

Although not quite as dramatic as Willis Reed's return from injury during Game 7 of the Knicks-Lakers series in 1970, the sudden recuperation of Griffin and Reid was a surprise to many, including head coach Tom Asbury, who said Griffin's clearance came at the 11th hour.

"(The decision) came as we watched them warm up and I talked to the trainer," Asbury said, who added that Griffin's full recovery from a knee injury might not occur until mid-December, resulting in a limited amount of playing time.

With the boost of two experienced backcourt players and the return of forward Manny Dies, who Asbury said was at about 85 percent after an ankle injury, the Cats used their sudden pool of depth to wear down the Gaels.

Putting forth a complete team effort, K-State finished the night with four players in double figures with no one playing more than 30 minutes.

GRIFFIN

Dies led the team with 15 points and 10 rebounds in only 22 minutes on the court.

The Cats' scoring began with a flurry from long range, as community-college transfer Cortez Groves hit two of his first three-point attempts. Groves wasn't the only newcomer to cash in, as freshman Josh Kimm, the expected starter at point guard before Griffin's return, nailed three from beyond the arch and helped lead K-State to a 42-32 lead at the half. The Cats finished with 9-16 shooting from the 3-point range, a blistering 56 percent.

"THIS YEAR, WE HAVE A TEAM OF GREAT SHOOTERS BOTH OUR STARTERS AND SUBSTITUTES CAN PLAY AT THIS LEVEL."

— CHRIS GRIFFIN
K-STATE GUARD

At the charity stripe, K-State finished at 71 percent, a monumental improvement on the two previous exhibition performances.

After a competitive first half, Saint Mary's lack of depth contributed to its downfall. Without the services of 7-foot, 3-inch center Brad "Big Continent" Millard, the Gaels struggled inside and couldn't counter from downtown. The team shot a collective 9-26 from beyond the 3-point line.

Senior forward Eric Schraeder,

Saint Mary's lone inside threat, suffered through four of 20 shooting and became Bramlage's first victim of the season when he fouled out late in the game with 11 points.

Expecting a similar depth problem entering the game, K-State utilized its roster and worked 12 players into the contest, keeping the pace up-tempo and under control.

ASBURY

Griffin, who entered Friday's home opener with nothing more than a light workout Wednesday for preparation, spent 21 minutes as the Cats' court general. Although the newcomers stepped up and filled the guard spots well, Asbury said he believed they were happy to know an experienced player was ready if needed.

"I think deep down in their hearts, they were glad to see him," he said, referring to Griffin's health.

While limited playing time might spark a dispute with others, Griffin said he was happy to see others step in and perform.

"This year, we have a team of great shooters," he said.

"Both our starters and substitutes can play at this level."

The Cats continue the season tonight with a home contest against Cal State Fullerton at about 8 p.m. as part of a double-header with the women's team.

K-State forward Ty Sims goes up for a shot in the first half Friday against St. Mary's. The Wildcats won 83-60.

Turnovers help Cats win handily

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Wildcats caused 30 turnovers. They had 13 steals.

But, the K-State women's basketball team's 80-40 exhibition win against the Shelen Basketball Club from Krasnoyarsk, Russia, on Friday night wasn't perfect.

The team lost freshman point guard Essence Perry to a wrist injury, and the Cats' 40.6 shooting percentage and 11 turnovers in the second half left room for improvement.

The win pushed K-State's exhibition record to 2-0 and marks the second-straight game in which the Cats defeated an exhibition opponent handily. K-State beat the Svaja Edroma Lithuanian team by 38 in its opener.

With the dynamic duo of junior forward Angie Finkes and Perry leading the way, the Cats held the Shelen team to a dismal 34-percent shooting from the floor.

"I thought we improved on the boards, and we didn't go through scoring droughts," Coach Deb Patterson said. "I like our aggressiveness, and I thought we were moving the ball well. In that respect, we are getting better."

K-State had three players in double figures. Finkes poured in 20 points and grabbed five boards, while Brandy Harris scored 10 points and pulled down six rebounds. Perry scored 13 points before leaving the game.

Starting the game strong, K-State took a 21-9 lead with less than 10 minutes to go in the first half. Going on a 23-5 run, the Wildcats tightened their grip on Shelen's jugular and ended the half up 46-18.

Junior center Olga Firsova said the team was starting to work together as a solid unit.

"It's starting to feel comfortable," she said.

— ANGIE FINKES
K-STATE FORWARD

"We are trying to play together as a team."

With Perry's injury, the Cats have several key players on the disabled list. Starting senior guard Jenny Coalson failed to play because of a back injury, and sophomore guard Dee DeShay will be gone for the season.

"Jenny's back injury is another obstacle to overcome," Patterson said.

"I would mark her questionable for Monday night's game."

"I think there is a high probability that Essence's injury is a fracture. There's always the chance that you can cast it and play, but certainly, that is another challenge for our freshman point guard."

Finkes said the Wildcats are improving.

"From last week to this week, we have improved a lot," she said.

"Our guards have improved. Our post play has improved. This game, we just tried to keep everyone up and on their toes."

K-State will start its official schedule at 6 p.m. tonight at Bramlage Coliseum against Ohio State.

Car wreck kills Kentucky football player

By TIM WHITMIRE
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LEXINGTON, Ky. — A truck carrying two Kentucky football players on a deer-hunting trip flipped on a rural highway Sunday, killing one of them and injuring starting center Jason Watts.

Another man, a passenger who was not on the team, also was killed in the early-morning accident in which the pickup truck veered off the highway and then swung back onto the road before rolling over.

Killed were Arthur Steinmetz, 19, of Edgewood, a defensive lineman who transferred to Kentucky from Michigan State in August and was sitting out the season, and Scott Brock, 21, of Hyden.

Watts, the driver, was in fair condition Sunday after being airlifted to Lexington's University of Kentucky Medical Center from Lake Cumberland Regional Hospital in Somerset. Brock and Steinmetz were pronounced dead at the scene.

Watts suffered a severe laceration of his forearm and was to have surgery Monday to begin cleaning the wound and repairing the damage, Kentucky athletic director C.M. Newton said at a Sunday evening news conference.

Newton spoke on behalf of football coach Hal Mumme, who canceled his usual Sunday conference call.

"Hal is really struggling with this," Newton said. "On a personal level, he's struggling with it, and on a professional level, he's doing what he needs to be doing, which is being available to his players and to the families involved as well as his own staff."

Newton said Mumme planned to visit Watts on Sunday evening. Kentucky's director of media relations, Rena Vicini, said about two dozen teammates had come to see Watts in the emergency room Sunday.

Watts was aware of what had happened and was grieving, said Newton. Vicini described the scene as "very emotional."

"You think they're men and then you see them in situations like this, and they're really just kids," she said.

The accident occurred just hours after Kentucky (7-3) defeated Vanderbilt 55-17 on Saturday at Commonwealth Stadium. Watts was one of the players honored during Senior Day ceremonies on the field that were attended by his parents.

Pulaski County Sheriff Sam Catron said the accident happened just before 7 a.m. EST on southbound U.S. 27, about 60 miles south of Lexington and 10 miles north of Somerset.

Catron said the 1985 Chevy truck in which the men were traveling drifted onto the shoulder of the road. Watts apparently got the truck back on the pavement but overcorrected, sending it across the two-lane highway and off the other side, throwing all three men from the vehicle, Catron said.

None were wearing seat belts.

According to Newton, Watts walked to a nearby farmhouse for help. In addition to the cut to his forearm, which stretched from his elbow to his wrist, Watts suffered a number of bruises and other cuts.

Newton said he had been given no indication alcohol was involved in the accident.

The Wildcats finish their regular season Saturday against undefeated and top-ranked Tennessee at Knoxville. They are expected to receive their first bowl bid since 1993.

"Something like this kind of puts bowl games and winning seasons and a big game with an arch-rival into perspective," Newton said. "You go from a high of a Saturday we all experienced to the reality of a Sunday morning."

Watts, a three-year starter from Oviedo, Fla., is an avid outdoorsman who loves fishing, hunting and listed alligator wrestling as his hobby in the team media guide.

Artist's instrumental songs tell a story

By M.A. LOROFF
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In the middle of a quiet room, Martin Simpson begins to tell a story. His eyes are closed as he visualizes each piece of the tale and interprets it to others with clarity.

When the story ends, the audience sits mesmerized for a moment before breaking into applause. The passion of the storyteller was passed to others, and he didn't speak a word.

Simpson, who is known for his solo guitar performances and musical interpretation and clarity, was a featured performer Saturday in the BirdHouse concert series.

David Kameron, director of the BirdHouse series, said Simpson is one of his favorite all-around musicians.

"He just blows me away," Kameron said.

During his first set, Simpson played mostly Celtic music, and his songs came alive using various techniques.

Simpson uses altered tunings to produce cascades of sustained notes and has a right-hand attack influenced by banjo-frailing techniques. Each note had remarkable clarity, making it seem as though Simpson could render his guitar to play by itself.

After two songs about leaving, Simpson sang a song on which he thought they were based. The song told the story of an earl's wife running off with a gypsy caravan.

"The musicians came to her door, and she runs away with them," Simpson said. "It's why most of us become musicians, anyway."

Sam Hays, who came to the BirdHouse to hear Simpson play, said the concert was very good.

"It was very relaxing, and there was a lot of flow to the music," Hays said. "His playing style came from many different influences, but he was able to mold styles to form a style all his own."

Simpson also sang songs written by Bob Dylan, band members with whom he had played previously and his wife, Jessica Ruby Simpson.

Simpson's second set of music was primarily blues with a few Irish ballads mixed in for flavor.

During all of the Celtic and Irish ballads, Simpson made his voice sound as if he were a minstrel from long ago. The minute he sang the blues, Simpson became 100-percent American blues.

Simpson said he didn't think that some of the songs would become geographically accurate for him.

"One day, you move (a) house, and now Highway 61 runs by my baby's door," Simpson said before singing two songs about the highway.

After the concert, Simpson was called out one last time to sing a few songs as an encore.

Simpson's newest album, "Cool and Unusual," makes connections between Celtic music and American music's black roots. His previous albums are "Smoke and Mirrors," a blues album; "When I Was On Horseback" and "Leaves of Life," each of which features British, Irish and Scottish ballads.

Exhibit showcases what we see every day

By RUSSELL FORTMEYER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In physics, it's said that what goes up must come down.

In architecture, it's more like what goes up must reflect what goes down.

This is a fancy way of saying that floors matter. And if the exhibition, "Italian Pavements: Patterns in Space," in the Chang Gallery through Friday has it right, Italians are the masters of the surfaces on which we walk and have been for more than two millennia.

The exhibition is a series of drawings by architect Kim Williams for her recently published book, titled the same as the exhibition and available at Clafin Books and Copies.

Taking her own measurements and observations, Williams has documented the floor patterns of some of Italy's top treasures, from Rome's Pantheon to Florence's Duomo. The continuity of design expression throughout the centuries is clear, although the complexity of the patterns evolves from rather simple tiles to exuberant circular constructions.

The exhibition, which fills the Chang, includes informative panels giving background to the rich Italian pavement tradition. In the text, Williams says that pavement is "a translation into two dimensions of three-dimensional spatial concepts, indicating direction and rhythm of movement through the architecture, defining separations or connections between spaces, providing indications of scale."

Williams, who lives in Italy, will give a public lecture Wednesday in the Union Forum Hall. The K-State leg of the exhibition was coordinated by Carol Watts, associate professor of architecture, and her husband, Don Watts, professor of architecture. Carol Watts said she met Williams in Italy after Williams had contacted her about an article the Wattses had written.

Carol Watts, whose research has focused on ancient Roman residential architecture, said that contemporary architects don't use expressive floors as much as they could.

"We have a tendency to have wall-to-wall carpeting," she said. "It's treated as a solid surface of one color — a neutral surface like white walls. It's as important as the walls and ceiling, as far as planes that define space."

there has not been much work undertaken on the architectural relationship of pavement. She said that Williams takes her own measurements and that the process of documentation has been a research tool for the architect. Williams' work, as well as this exhibition, is sponsored by the Graham Foundation for Advanced Studies in the Fine Arts. The show originated in Chicago.

MORE INFO?

Kim Williams will lecture on Italian pavement designs at 4:30 p.m. on Wednesday in the Union Little Theatre. The exhibition, "Italian Pavements: Patterns in Space," runs through Friday in the Chang Gallery in Seaton Hall. Gallery hours are 3 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday.

The film starts out just as you would expect it to. It is a dark and stormy night out on the rough ocean, when a Japanese fishing boat is attacked by what looks like a giant lizard. No one can quite figure out what it was, so the Army is called in to investigate.

Since the military does not know a single thing about biology, it is forced to acquire the services of Dr. Niko Tatopoulos, a radiation-induced-mutation expert and biologist played by an unconvincing Matthew Broderick. While the United States is figuring out that this is all the cause of French nuclear testing, a small band of French Secret Service men, lead by the always-exciting Jean Reno, is secretly on the case. (There is no real reason for them to be there other than just to take up space.)

Godzilla slips past all lookouts and makes his way into New York. From this point on, the film's impressive — but completely unoriginal — special effects take over. The over-sized reptile is a reminder of a small film from a few years back known as "Jurassic Park." Dr. Tatopoulos discovers that Godzilla might be laying large, slimy eggs (just like in "Aliens"). The Army does not believe him and focuses on trying to blow the lizard up and all of New York with it.

Another element thrown into the mix is a faint love story between Broderick's character and a wannabe reporter named Audrey Timmonds (Maria Pitillo), who turns out to be Broderick's former college sweetheart. There is no mention that after eight years of being apart, he still has pictures of her, as if they still were together. She sees it as being cute; others would see it as being obsessed.

This subplot just drags the movie on longer.

"Godzilla" is nothing more than several ripoffs of other movies, just like the creator's last film, "Independence Day," was a cheap copy of "War of the Worlds." The plot was stolen from the 1950's classic "The Beast from 20,000 Fathoms." The lizard looked like one of the raptors from "Jurassic Park." Heck, even Broderick's character seemed like Ferris Bueller out on another adventure. The result of the film is a feeling that this lizard should have remained dead and locked in a film vault somewhere.

Years of economic hardship ahead for Central America

By MICHELLE RAY ORTIZ
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

OJOCHAL, Nicaragua — Ricardo Santeliz looked over the land where his family's farm once stood. What had been fertile fields of peanuts is now a wasteland of caked mud.

Where the family had grown sorghum, beans, sugar cane and soy, the gnarled roots of huge trees claw up from the earth.

"Now the situation is very critical regarding the question of food," the young man said, adding that his family would look to move elsewhere.

"Here there is no hope."

Santeliz is just one of an uncounted number of Central Americans whose livelihood was destroyed by Hurricane Mitch. The disaster, which killed as many as 10,000, will be felt in the region's economy for years.

Governments, overwhelmed by the need for relief work and stymied by broken communication links, have yet to calculate the full magnitude of the economic loss.

The storm destroyed as much as 70 percent of important crops, such as bananas and coffee in Honduras and Nicaragua, along with most of the roads and bridges needed to carry produce from the rural mountains to central markets.

The Inter-American Development Bank has estimated up to 90 percent of roads and other infrastructure was destroyed in Honduras, the worst-hit nation.

Rebuilding bridges across Central America's rugged terrain could take two to four years, analysts say.

The economies of Central America's two largest nations had been hurting before the storm. The global economic crisis had forced a drop in prices for their key exports, said Francisco Larios, a senior emerging markets economist with Standard and Poor's DRI in Lexington, Mass.

Now with the damage caused by Mitch, "you're probably going to see not only recession but severe drops in growth," Larios said.

Agriculture is responsible for a quarter of Honduras' economic output and employs nearly two-thirds of the workforce. In Nicaragua, it accounts for 15 percent of the gross domestic product and employs more than 40 percent of its workforce.

Nicaragua's Labor Ministry said this week that Mitch surely had put thousands of people out of work.

To offset the damage, the government has offered 10,000 temporary jobs, such as helping clean debris from roads and highways at a weekly salary of 100 cordobas, or $10.

Similarly, aid groups are supplying rice, beans and other staples to men and women clearing roads in the province of Chinandega, home to the city of Leon and the village of Ojochal.

Labor unions, though, see the job programs as a threat to other workers. The work will be temporary, and when it ends, the hurricane victims will be left wanting.

"The rural populations will find it hard to come back, and you will see a deepening of poverty," Larios said, a native of Nicaragua.

The Nicaraguan Labor Ministry said many companies have asked to suspend their businesses temporarily to recover from the storm's damage.

In some regions, schools and factories have shut down to shelter hurricane victims.

Meanwhile, Nicaragua and Honduras, citing the need to rebuild their countries, have asked for forgiveness of the combined $10 billion they owe in foreign debt.

France agreed to the requests last week.

Nicaraguan President Arnoldo Aleman called it "a message of optimism which surely will stimulate other countries to take the same decision."

Nicaragua owed $70 million of its $6 billion foreign debt to France. Honduras owed $4.2 billion, $30 million of it to France.

Cuba also announced it was canceling Nicaraguan debts of $50 million, nearly all of which apparently was borrowed by the nation's leftist Sandinista government in the 1980s.

The governments also could try to persuade private lenders not to demand scheduled payments, to extend repayment deadlines and to cut interest rates, said Sung Won Sohn, chief economist with Wells Fargo Bank in Minneapolis.

Larios said, "For all practical purposes, Nicaragua and Honduras will be unable to repay, at least in 1999, because of the magnitude of the tragedy."

The countries will be under internal pressure to quickly rebuild and put the millions of dollars it is receiving in foreign aid to good use.

In Nicaragua, bad memories remain over the government's slow reconstruction efforts and misuse of foreign aid after a devastating 1972 earthquake.

The scandal helped build support for the leftist Sandinistas, who seized power in 1979.

"The governments will be keen to avoid the perception that this is dragging on too long," Larios said.

"These are among the poorest countries in the Western Hemisphere. What is now an economic disaster could very quickly erupt into a political problem."

You know that there's more to Japan than Sony, sushi and sumo. But do you know about taijiko? Ondekoza (demon drummers) is one of the preeminent taijiko ensembles. And this 17-member ensemble has thrilled audiences across the U.S. from Alaska to New York's Carnegie Hall.

Taijiko refers both to the drums and to drumming as an art form. Dating back perhaps more than 1,000 years, taijiko was used in both Buddhist and Shinto religious ceremonies. Since the 1960s, however, taijiko has been performed by a variety of drum ensembles in a style that emphasizes speed, fluidity and power.

There is nothing compared to the beat, beat, with the sound and power building and building. You're a part of a magical, wonderful experience. The power surrounds you and draws you in. It's like being inside a thunderstorm. We were entirely "drum-struck" by Ondekoza, and Wow! I loved it! "Angel" Rolling Thunder.

Kansas State University is proud to present a special concert by the Ondekoza ensemble. This performance is a rare opportunity to experience the power of taijiko. The performance is presented by the Friends of the Arts, a 501(c)(3) non-profit organization. Proceeds from the concert will be used to support the K-State Arts Center.

K-State memorabilia hits stores right after victory

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Saturday's Nebraska game didn't just bring thousands of fans to Manhattan. The win also brought thousands of customers to local shops looking for commemorative T-shirts and other memorabilia.

Becky Ballard, manager of Ballard's Sporting Goods in Aggieville, said T-shirt sales have been in the thousands.

"It's been unbelievable," she said. Ballard said the store still is selling victory shirts, and she wouldn't be able to give a good estimate of sales until later in the week. To accommodate for the demand, Ballard's opened its doors two hours early Sunday.

"They're buying them as fast as we're printing them," Ballard said. Ballard said the store would not stay open past 5 p.m.

"Our employees are exhausted," she said.

K-State quarterback Michael Bishop also visited Ballard's. Ballard said Bishop was stuck in the store for 45 minutes signing autographs.

Varney's Book Store in Aggieville also has been swamped with business since the game ended Saturday night. The store was supposed to close at 9 p.m. Saturday, but Leah Sobba, Varney's apparel and gift manager, said the store didn't close until after 10 p.m.

Sobba said Varney's was swamped more than she ever imagined.

"I really didn't anticipate well. It's a huge learning experience," she said. "This is just the beginning."

Varney's also opened its doors early

Sunday to accommodate for customers. Sobba said closing time would depend on how things went throughout the day.

Though It's Greek To Me Inc. isn't located near a busy business district, the apparel store still was catering to hundreds of fans wanting K-State merchandise Sunday afternoon.

At about 2:45 p.m., sales clerk Sarah VanPelt said there was a line out the door, and it had been that way since the store opened at noon.

VanPelt said the store was already out of its victory shirts.

Varney's is one step closer to having another swamp of customers if K-State continues its undefeated season.

Before the season began, the store made a deal called "It's Payback Time" with its customers.

If K-State wins 13 games, Varney's will refund the money to customers who bought merchandise the week before the first game, including game day on Sept. 5.

The deal also included Varney's K-State Place at Manhattan Town Center and the Children's Book Shop in Aggieville, which are extensions of Varney's. The deal excluded textbooks, Kansas Cellular products and class rings.

Sobba said she hoped K-State would go undefeated, and the store was ready to refund customers' money when the time came.

"You don't make deals like that unless you're prepared for it," she said. "We'd be excited to do it, actually."

Transcend Technologies also made a similar deal with customers called "Perfect Season, Perfect Price."

GOALPOST

Fans stormed the field with seconds remaining in the game, which critics had called K-State's first true test of the 1998 season. The mob formed underneath the north goalpost, storming the field twice and then returning to the sidelines to allow time to expire.

Some screamed, others cried and many stared at the scoreboard in disbelief as the game ended. A Gatorade-drenched Snyder headed for the locker room amid cheers from fans. As others shouted their appreciation, one alumnus hugged President Jon Wefald as he took the field. "God bless you," one cried, "for doing this wonderful thing for us."

Later, a normally stoic Snyder smiled when reporters asked how he felt about the win.

"I'm happy. I can assure you of that," he said. "I feel very good about this win. I'm humbled by it, in all honesty, because of how long it took."

K-State's come-from-behind victory made the team's coach smile and warmed the hearts of sports commentators across the country. On ESPN, whose "College GameDay" crew had produced its shows from Manhattan since Friday, all three analysts picked K-State as the No. 1 team in the country in their evening wrap-up.

Students, for their part, were celebrating, too — and trying to figure out the best way to bring down the goalpost that had seen their team to victory. That task was harder than it looked.

As the stadium and national television audience waited, students jumped, pulled, climbed and tugged at the steel post, while others shouted instructions from the field. A rope, used for crowd control earlier in the game, became a tool for the mob of students who weren't already throwing their weight behind the project. Several heave-hos from the crowd helped pull the posts to one side.

Finally, it gave, and fans fell to the turf with their prized possession.

By Sunday, Sports Information director Kent Brown said he wasn't aware of any injuries.

And they marched. Up the hill — and through a fence — at the northeast corner of the stadium. Besides the goalpost, Brown said the fence was the only other damage he knew of from Saturday's game.

The trek, with a police escort, continued down Kimball Avenue to Denison Avenue, where it weaved through campus to the intersection of Claflin Road and North Manhattan Avenue.

The journey's final leg resembled a parade route; parents and their children lined the streets with cameras, waving at students who, carrying street signs as their banners, approached their destination.

As the crowd hit Moro Street, the party began. Students, sweating and grunting under the weight of their charge, hoisted the symbol of their team's victory onto the roof at Last Chance, stopped for a second to admire their work and dispersed, content to stand in line at Aggieville's bars through the rest of the night.

Bartenders estimated the crowd of fans who had stayed in Aggieville during the game. One said 3,000, the other, 20,000. But after the victory, the streets filled. Riley County Police Department reports included no serious disturbances, but fire officials cleared some bars that had exceeded their capacity.

JILL JARSULIC/KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN
K-State coach Bill Snyder yells instructions to the Cats during the last K-State drive of the first half. The drive resulted in a touchdown on a 1-yard run by quarterback Michael Bishop.

"It was absolute insanity," said Lee Lojka, co-owner of Tula's Out of Bounds Sports Bar and Grill. "Things were going so fast."

"We were all jumping and cheering, and tortillas were flying everywhere," he said, referring to the flour shells that have become synonymous with the Fiesta Bowl.

At Porter's, bartender Andi Timpany, senior in kinesiology, said the post-victory celebration was different from any she had ever seen.

"It was like a New Year's party. People were hugging, kissing, in good moods and very drunk," Timpany said. "Tips were a lot higher last night. People were very generous."

Lojka said lines at his bar and throughout Aggieville stretched out the doors, and streets were filled with fans who wanted to be a part of the historic party. "The last time it was really packed was during the big riot after the KU game in 1987," Lojka said. "We always have a crowd after a victory, but tonight was big."

But even with the crowd, no significant violence disrupted the celebration. The RCPD listed nearly 50 alcohol-related offenses from gameday in its daily log, but no more information was available at press time. A spokeswoman at the department said no one would comment on the Aggieville enforcement until sometime this morning.

Timpany said no one was too disruptive inside Porter's, either.

"We did have a burning of a Nebraska flag, though," she said.

Jon Balmer and Jeff Sutton contributed to this story.

KU program offers model for SafeRide at K-State

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Because incidents of drunk driving increase with each passing weekend, K-State students could use a safe alternative when heading home in the evenings.

For a model program, the Student Governing Association wouldn't need to look any farther than Lawrence. For more than 12 years, the University of Kansas' SafeRide program successfully has provided transportation options for students.

"It's not just the students who drink that use this system," said Nicole Skalla, transportation coordinator for KU's Student Senate. "It's also the students who are scared to walk home alone at night or are afraid of dangerous drivers."

Since being elected in April, Skalla has been in charge of all aspects of campus transportation, including the KU on Wheels bus system, wheelchair-accessible lift vans and SafeRide. It is the responsibility of Skalla to handle day-to-day administrative work for Student Senate; this includes hearing complaints and handing out refunds. However, much of Skalla's time is occupied by KU's stance against drunk driving.

"Driving drunk is a very real issue on college campuses," Skalla said.

Student fees help fund KU service to provide sober rides home

"SafeRide's purpose is to eliminate this problem."

SafeRide began in 1986 under the name SecureCab. To avoid liability issues, KU hired an independent contractor, Lawrence's City Cab Company, as the drivers for the program. By calling 864-SAFE, KU students can receive rides from any bar or party in Lawrence to their homes, free of charge. The only requirement of a rider is that they have their student identification.

"It's a policy that anyone riding in a SafeRide car needs a KU student ID, but a driver won't refuse to give you a ride home," Skalla said.

The program worked well until December 1987 when SecureCab's new vendor, Union Cab Company, doubled the rates they initially had charged the university. Student Senate members were forced to cancel the program due to poor funding and look into other options.

A few weeks later, the program was born again, this time as Secure Shuttle. This system no longer was a demand-response system in which students could call for transportation from anywhere in the city. Instead, the shuttles worked on a fixed route system, with just 11 stops around the KU campus and downtown Lawrence. Due to low ridership and high costs, Student Senate canceled the Secure Shuttle program in February 1989.

Today, SafeRide is back to a call-in system, and students may request rides any night of the week. Cars are dispatched according to demand, with only one car on call for Monday nights, and more than seven on Friday and Saturday nights.

At enrollment every semester, KU charges a $16 fee that goes toward student transportation needs, such as the campus bus system and accessible lift vans. Less than $2 of this fee is used to pay the present SafeRide vendor.

"We're currently looking at other funding options besides student funds," Skalla said. "We'd like to take money from the city alcohol-tax fund." Skalla said the Anheuser-Busch Company also

Senior honorary to acknowledge campus leaders

By KELLE MILLER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Recognizing the many faces of leadership is the focus of today's Blue Key Honorary Society's Leadership Recognition Day.

"Each culture expects different things out of their leaders," said Laura Buller, Leadership Recognition Day co-chair. "There isn't one specific leadership style, and Blue Key doesn't define what perfect leadership should be — there are different styles and techniques."

This year's theme, "The Many Faces of Leadership," was chosen to coincide with the speech topic of featured lecturer Bernard Franklin, as well as acknowledge the different types of leaders on campus, said John Pope, Leadership Recognition Day co-chair.

"We wanted to recognize all the leaders on the K-State campus from advisers to faculty to student leaders," Pope said. "We want to recognize the day-in, day-out job they do on campus."

The day's focus was changed this year by calling it Leadership Recognition Day instead of Leadership Appreciation Day. Pope said Blue Key wanted to focus more on recognizing leadership on campus.

"We wanted to recognize leadership qualities, not just individual leaders," Pope said. "We wanted to show that we appreciate leadership qualities as a whole."

Susan Scott, Blue Key adviser, said the purpose of the day is to promote visibility and the importance of leadership on campus.

"There are so many organization officers that do so much work for the campus and never get recognized, and this is our way to say 'thank you' to them," Scott

Recycling plan fails after volunteers opt to go to 'GameDay'

■ 30 workers commit to collecting cans before TV show comes to town.

The recycling effort at the tailgating party before the Nebraska game was unsuccessful. However, organizers said the idea was a good one that sparked a statewide contest and has the potential to become a yearly, competitive event.

"A lot of other schools got into it," Stacy Meredith, organizer of the event, said. "We didn't win, but it doesn't matter — it's about getting recycling awareness out there."

Everything was in place for the collection of aluminum cans from tailgaters before the game to be a success, John Woods, director of Facilities Services, said.

"I set up the trailers and did lots of things to prepare," Woods said. "Stacy and I were the only ones who showed up, and we left 45 minutes later."

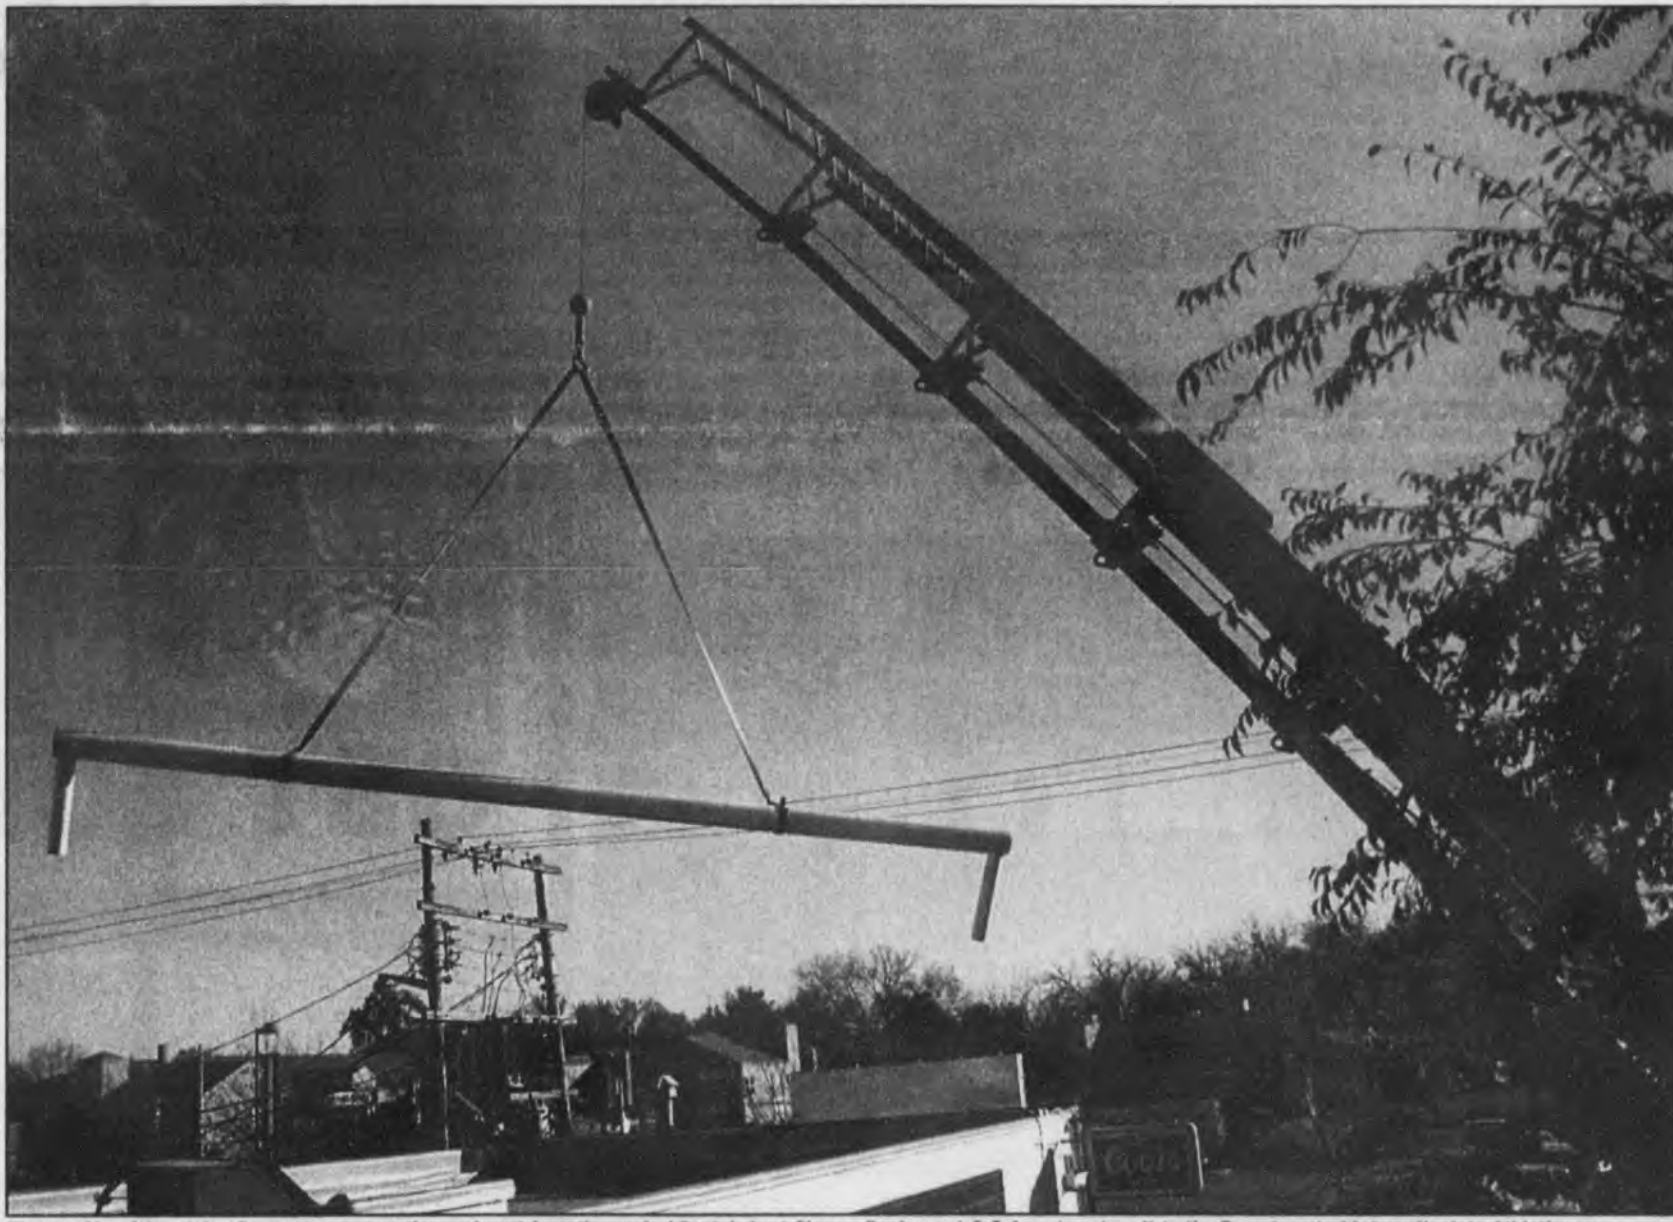

Woods said some of the grounds crew collected what it could when emptying trash and by picking up the few bags of cans that were left by tailgaters. Woods said he had projected a game-day collection of about 17 pounds.

"There just wasn't enough help to do anything," he said. "If people who said they'd be there would have, it would have worked out."

Meredith said nearly 30 students told her they

THE GOAL POST COMES DOWN ... AGAIN

Thomas Sign Advertising Company removes the goal post from the roof of Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon to return it to the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics on Tuesday afternoon. It was the first time in 10 years that the company had a goal post break.

Athletic department brings goal post back from Aggieville

PHOTOGRAPHS BY STEVEN DEARINGER

Monday afternoon, the K-State Department of Intercollegiate Athletics confiscated the goal post that was slowly torn down by the Wildcat faithful from Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon in Aggieville.

"We're looking at it as retrieving," said Jim Muller, associate director of Bramlage Coliseum. "It's property of Kansas State University."

Rusty Wilson, owner of Last Chance, said he wanted to keep it there for the fans.

"I was going to leave it up there. We're going to paint the score and date on it. I think it'll be neat for the fans to come back years from now and remember the game and putting it up there. The fans put it there. That's where they wanted it," he said.

Early Monday morning, several individuals were caught cutting pieces of the goal post from the top of Rusty's. Muller said they are treating the matter as stolen property, and it would be handled by city authorities.

"We're not looking to bust anyone," Muller said. "We would just appreciate cooperation in getting the missing pieces back."

The athletic department is unsure at this time on what will happen with the remaining portion of the goal post, but the ultimate decision will be made by the athletic department.

K-State put itself in another record book following the win over the Nebraska Cornhuskers. K-State became the first school to tear down a goal post made by Merchants Environmental Industries of Chicago, Ill., in the 10-year history of the design.

"They used steel rather than aluminum," said Bob Cavello, business manager for the athletic department. "They allowed it to be

Police work together to control KSU fans

Security in the stadium and the Aggieville area was increased Saturday following K-State's long-awaited victory over Nebraska in order to help control crowds.

K-State Police had a higher than usual number of security assignments at the stadium due to the two TV crews covering the game, Captain Robert Mellgren said.

Mellgren said campus police had some assistance from the Riley County Police Department for the game.

Although the big game required more security than other games, the aftermath was fairly calm, Mellgren said. Nothing out of the ordinary occurred on campus.

"Following the game, activity was less than expected," Mellgren said.

The only damage on campus and to the Aggieville area was caused by the goal posts being carried down the street.

The RCPD also brought extra manpower to help control crowds following the game.

Captain Steve French said this was done in order to deter any type of criminal activity in the Aggieville area.

The RCPD received help from the Kansas State Highway Patrol, the Pottawatomie County Police, K-State Police, University of Kansas Police and Ft. Riley Military Police.

French said the RCPD planned well for the event and had the right number of officers in Aggieville. "People realized not to infringe on others' rights," he said. "The equation worked out real well."

Although controlling the crowds wasn't much of a problem, there was an increase in alcohol violations, such as MIPs and open containers. The RCPD gave out 56 alcohol violations and 66 notices to appear. French said although the numbers were higher than usual, they are relatively low in proportion to the number of people in Aggieville on Saturday.

Overall, K-State fans behaved in a responsible manner, French said.

"I want to thank the students and the community," French said. "We could have had a black eye, but instead, we have a very positive image from the national coverage we received."

Correction-unit move would save $4 million

TOPEKA — The state Department of Corrections plans to relocate its center for evaluating new inmates to its prison outside El Dorado, Kan. Legislators' responses vary.

Secretary Charles Simmons announced the decision Monday, only three days after two out-of-state consultants recommended the Reception and Diagnostic Unit be moved from Topeka.

The department said it believes the three Topeka Correctional Facility buildings that house the unit are unsafe for staff and inmates, mostly because of their age. The agency said it believes it can save about $4 million in construction costs at the El Dorado prison.

Northeast Kansas legislators probably will try to prevent relocation of the unit after the Legislature convenes Jan. 11. But some legislators support the change.

"It was the proper decision," said Sen. Ben Vidricksen, R-Salina, chairman of the Legislature's Joint Committee on State Building Construction.

Sen. Alicia Salisbury, R-Topeka, said she would prefer the unit stay in her hometown, but she acknowledged that the higher construction costs represent a compelling reason for a move.

She took comfort in a statement from Simmons that the Department of Corrections would renovate the unit's current buildings in Topeka to house minimum-security inmates.

The 1998 Legislature appropriated $500,000 to the department for planning the new reception unit. Legislators still would have to appropriate the nearly $15.9 million necessary to build two new housing units at the El Dorado prison.

The reception center would be placed in two existing housing units at El Dorado, and inmates now living in those buildings would move to the new ones. The department wants to begin construction by January 2000 and finish by July 2001.

Lewinsky signs deal for detailed biography

LONDON — Monica Lewinsky has signed a deal with Princess Diana's biographer for a tell-all book about her affair with President Clinton and will talk about the liaison for the first time in an interview with Barbara Walters.

The deals were announced Monday by British publisher Michael O'Mara, who put the book project together, and ABC News.

O'Mara said Lewinsky was drawn to the book idea because it would be written by Andrew Morton, whose book, "Diana: Her True Story," blew the lid on the princess' troubled marriage.

"She likes the idea of an author who is used to writing sympathetic books about women who have relationships with powerful men," said O'Mara, chairman of London-based Michael O'Mara Books.

"It wasn't the money," he said. "She could have got much higher prices elsewhere."

He refused to confirm news reports of a seven-figure deal for the book that will be published simultaneously in Britain and the United States.

But the New York Post reported Monday that the North American rights alone are worth that. The British news agency Press Association said Lewinsky and Morton could earn more than $1.6 million just from publishing in Britain.

The book, to be called "Monica's Story," is expected to be in stores by the summer, said John Murphy, a spokesman for the U.S. publisher St. Martin's Press of New York.

O'Mara said there was a "strong personal chemistry" between the former White House intern and Morton.

"We put the two of them together in a New York hotel room last week, and she said yes immediately," O'Mara said.

Meanwhile, ABC announced Walters would interview Lewinsky for the ABC show "20/20" sometime early next year, according to a network spokeswoman, Eileen Murphy.

She said the exact date would depend on "resolution of pending legal issues involving Lewinsky's ability to speak publicly about the events surrounding her relationship with President Clinton."

Lewinsky's immunity agreement contains a no-talk provision, and she must secure a release from Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr to speak publicly about the affair.

5 allegedly plot to kill classmates, faculty

BURLINGTON, Wis. — Five boys, who complained they were being picked on, plotted to kill certain staff members and students in a classroom-to-classroom bloodbath at their high school, police said Monday.

The boys, all 15 or 16, told police they had intended to carry out the attack Monday using guns stolen from one of the youngsters' homes, said Assistant Police Chief Gary Large.

The teen-ager got cold feet and tried to back out, so the group never got the guns, police said.

An informant tipped police to the alleged plot, and all five teen-agers were taken into custody Sunday night.

Two were released without being charged. The three others appeared in juvenile court Monday and were ordered held without bail on charges of conspiracy to commit murder.

Some fellow students said the five dressed in black, listened to heavy-metal music and wanted classmates to think they worshiped Satan.

The five allegedly had planned to meet at Burlington High School, keep administrators at gunpoint and order them to lock down the school.

"And then they would go specifically to where those classrooms were and handle what they thought they had to do," Large said.

Police said the boys had a hit list of students and educators, including the principal and assistant principal. The boys told police their list included students who had "treated them like trash," prosecutor Richard Barta said.

Barta said the teen-agers described their plot as a suicide mission.

Other students picked on the boys because of their satanic image, John Janowski, freshman, said.

Wave of purple brings green to Little Apple

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Football fans took a bite out of the Little Apple last weekend, buying large amounts of food, beverages and fan paraphernalia. Businesses' revenues greatly increased over the weekend, and some restaurants and bars ran out of certain menu items.

Most restaurant and bar managers said the event only was comparable to the first K-state football game of the season or to the University of Kansas football game in 1995. No one expected the overwhelming mass of people.

"All in all, it was just unbelievable. Everybody was eating. Everybody was drinking. We've never seen anything like it," said Mark Miller, manager of Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon.

The bar added more security personnel and scheduled all of its staff from open to close. The bar witnessed the arrival of a triumphant goal post, which was secured on top of its roof.

Despite the crowd, Miller said everything ran smoothly.

"The only problem was getting served. I wish we had more room to accommodate people on the street. It was just a madhouse," Miller said.

Rusty Wilson, owner of Chance, declined to comment on the exact amount of revenue, although he said it was overall a good day.

This was the same response of Bob Leetch, owner of Lucky BrewGrille. Leetch said it was a great night, with sales mainly coming from pizza and beer.

"We know what we're doing," Leetch said.

"There were no problems with the ABC (Alcohol Beverage Control), the fire marshal or the local police. We just wanted to make sure everyone had a great time."

Prior to satisfying their social needs, football fans invaded restaurants and fast-food chains. Burger King assistant manager Candy Easton said Saturday's total revenue was $13,284; Sunday's was $6,000.

"It's the highest since we've been open," Easton said. "It was nice, but it was exhausting."

Extra security personnel and staff were present Saturday night, and Easton said there was no damage to the restaurant.

Subway manager Carly Nauman said despite an increase of employees, the restaurant should have focused more on keeping a steady supply of food.

"We ran out of bread more than once. We had to tell the customers to come back in 20 minutes," Nauman said.

The biggest revenue reported from this game, though, belongs to Ballard's Sporting Goods. Becky Ballard, manager of Ballard's, said revenue was triple compared to other game days.

"We had the problem of keeping up with demand. But everyone was so excited about the win that the customers were just wonderful," Ballard said.

Ballard's biggest sale was a T-shirt with the K-State-Nebraska score on it. Ballard said they had people printing late at night until the early morning.

"We sold them as we made them," Ballard said.

Ballard's gain was Varney's Book Store's loss. Assistant manager Steve Levin said although sales were up by 20 percent, he regrets not making game day T-shirts with the score on it.

Aggieville is more than a K-State student hangout. It's a great place for anyone, any time. Eighty-three percent of the K-State population shops at Aggieville businesses, and the Kansas State Collegian is read by more of the campus community than any other newspaper in the area.

Your advertisement in the Collegian will reach 30,000 adult readers — an on-campus audience equal to 55 percent of the Manhattan community. And the Collegian is not only read by the typical undergraduate — 64 percent of the campus community is faculty and staff, graduate students and non-traditional students.

The Collegian is the first choice of the K-State population for shopping information. More than 96 percent of the campus community reads the Collegian each week, with 85 percent reading the paper three times a week. That compares to only 24 percent who read the Manhattan Mercury.

Advertise your business in the Collegian's Aggieville promo, and remind consumers that Aggieville is not just a night place. It's the right place to shop.

The K-State population shops these locations regularly.

OUR VIEW

IVAN KOZAR/KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN
K-State fans carrying the goalpost made their way to Aggieville on Saturday after the game.

Goal posts or not, memories survive

It was inevitable. Talk every day the week before the Nebraska game centered around the upcoming game and the inevitable fall of the goal posts. Many students were just as excited about that thought as they were about the game.

So, when the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics installed new, hopefully indestructible goal posts two weeks prior to the big game, Wildcat fans were not worried. The goal posts would come down.

What was thought to be an impossible dream became a reality Saturday evening. The K-State Wildcats beat the mighty Nebraska Cornhuskers, and one of the indestructible goal posts came crashing down.

It might have taken all of 33 minutes to bring the steel post down, but K-State fans would not be denied, and the goal posts made the historic trip to Aggieville. One of the posts promptly was placed on the roof of Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon, where many thought it would rest forever as a monument to the great Wildcat win.

On Monday, the athletics department decided differently. The department wanted it back, and with all the firepower the Division of Facilities could muster, it got it back.

Once again, the goal posts came down.

It would be easy to be upset at the athletics department's removal of the great steel post from the roof of Chance, but that would be unjustified.

Let the athletics department do what it feels it must with the post. Let it sell the post, chop it up and sell it to the Wildcat faithful. Let it divide it between all the K-State players and coaches who made the win a reality and gave the fans the opportunity to tear the posts down to begin with.

K-State could take a piece of the goal post and memorialize it somewhere on the K-State campus as an everlasting symbol of Michael Bishop and Bill Snyder leading the Cats out of 29 years of frustration and heartache.

The point is, it doesn't matter what happens to the goal post. Whatever comes of it cannot take away any of the memories or any of the feelings that all K-State fans felt as the clock struck 0:00 and the scoreboard read K-State 40, Nebraska 30.

Those are the memories that will last forever, but as much fun as it was to see that goal post firmly entrenched on the roof of Chance, we would never need that to remind us of the great thing that happened on Saturday.

Win belongs in history books

Editor,
This is the most exciting event I can remember. I am a student at Pennsylvania State University, but I was stationed at Fort Riley from 1993 to 1995. I fell in love with Manhattan and K-State while I was stationed there. Compared to the barbarians who call themselves students here at Penn State, K-State students are ladies and gentlemen, even when they stormed the field Saturday — three times. Penn State students? Forget it. They would have trampled anyone in their way. You deserve it. I'm rooting for you on Jan. 4. Congratulations, and go K-State!

Leaders make K-State the great place it is

Today we would like to take a moment to recognize the many leaders who make important decisions that affect our campus.

Students, faculty, advisers and administrators accept the daily challenges of leadership and too often might not be recognized for their efforts. Where would K-State be without their vision? Their daily leadership contributions play an important part in the success of K-State.

Therefore, Blue Key Honor Fraternity would like to recognize these ongoing efforts with a day honoring leadership at our university.

It is easy to focus on all the presidents or heads of each of the campus organizations and assume they deserve all the recognition today for their positional leadership roles. However, the purpose of this day is not to devote time to an already "decorated" leader but to focus on the many leadership qualities within each and every member of the K-State community.

It takes more than just one person in a group working towards a common goal. Whether it is being the leader in a class project, organizing a Cats for Cans drive in your organization or speaking out against violence against women, it takes the effort of everyone to accomplish our common goals. Therefore, we all should recognize the qualities within ourselves that enable us to lead in small ways on our campus.

Leadership comes in different shapes and sizes. It is from this idea that the theme of this year's Leadership Recognition Day emerged.

"The Many Faces of Leadership" was chosen to recognize the different approaches, styles and attributes displayed by many leaders of our university. Through this variety of leadership techniques, we also see the importance of keeping an open mind as we look to the future of leadership. One can lead by one's actions, involvement in causes or by simply playing a supporting role in organizations.

In this spirit, Leadership Recognition Day will conclude with a keynote lecture by Bernard Franklin, vice president of the National Center for Fathering. Franklin previously served as a strong leader on the K-State campus as the assistant dean of student life. He will be speaking about what we can learn about leadership from other cultures as we move toward the 21st century. He recently has traveled to Africa and Latin America and is focused on the future of leadership. The speech will begin at 7 p.m. in McCain Auditorium and is free to everyone who wishes to attend.

Also today, we will recognize the caring dedication of the many advisers of campus organizations with an adviser's luncheon.

This will be complemented with a reception this evening for student leaders chosen by their organization.

You also will find a list in this paper of those student leaders whose names were submitted by their various organizations for the leadership qualities they have exemplified while serving their group.

In the spirit of Leadership Recognition Day, we hope these activities sufficiently recognize the many leaders of our K-State community.

Life as salesperson short-lived when you loathe being pushy

I can't sell stuff. I really thought I could. I really wanted to.

I figured I could make a few extra bucks for the holidays and picked up a part-time job at the local Mecca of materialism. I don't mind the mall too much this time of year — the music, the decorations, the children, the sales. But most importantly, I thought I could suffer through a holiday season at a retail store in the Manhattan Town Center if only for one reason — the employee discount.

Part of my inability to labor in the throes of consumerism is a lack of recent experience. I haven't worked retail in more than five years. I haven't worked in a mall since the late 1980s. The last time I worked in a mall, I tried to sell clothes. Think of the movie "Heathers." My few months of mall experience is not a positive chapter in my life.

There is art and skill involved in selling stuff that I just don't have. I think it has something to do with being poor as a child. I couldn't afford to shop at the mall. If I was talked into buying something by a talented salesperson, it almost certainly was being bought with my last few dollars. Or I was writing a bad check.

When I worked at the mall, or any store for that matter, I felt guilty when I sold someone something. I figured they couldn't really afford it. Just when I had gotten over the guilt, I figured the customer was just buying whatever it was because I either was really annoying and they just wanted me to go away or because they felt sorry for me. Insecurity is not a good thing at the mall.

That was long ago. I am not that insecure, poor teenager of the '80s. Besides, I really want that employee discount.

I applied at a happy, bright store in the mall. A store where I already buy things. A store that seemed like a fun place to work. A store with a great employee discount.

I was interviewed by an incredibly happy, bright person who bubbled and giggled while she interviewed me. A few days later, I got the call.

One evening last week, I went to my first training meeting. A few other women and I crammed in the back of the store to fill out the plethora of paperwork. I provided my two forms of identification to prove I am legal to work in this country. I signed a form swearing to never disclose any of the store's operating procedures, which is why I am not mentioning the name of the store.

Then came the cheesy training videos. First, it was the one about the company and how they are so great and huge and plan to keep on growing.

The second video was the kicker — sales techniques for employees of this fantastic company whose success depends on its renowned customer service and the enthusiasm and hard work of their associates.

I thought I could do it. I like the stuff in the store. I buy it. I use it. I just can't sell it to people. I can't pretend to like people just because they walk into my store. I can't pretend to be someone's friend and care what they are buying their mother for her birthday. I can't be a pushy saleswoman and keep suggesting more stuff to buy until the customer says no.

Part of my problem is my own shopping preferences. I hate pushy salespeople. When I go into a store, I want to be left alone. If I need something, I'll find a salesperson to help me. When they have helped me find what I want, they can go away.

I can't sell stuff in the mall, but I can wait tables. Selling food is a far cry from peddling pants or perfume. I like food. There is no pressure to sell. No one comes into a restaurant to browse. I feel no guilt pushing cheesecake on complete strangers, but hand lotion and candles are a different matter all together.

So I have decided to spend this holiday season at home with no nifty employee discount. This way, the only people I will have to pretend to like are my relatives.

'Wizard of Oz' label will last, but so will movie's greatness

I loathe Los Angeles. I know it is not fair to unleash unsaturated hatred on such a large geographic region and its inhabitants, but I just cannot cope with a city whose primary cultural advantage is, as Woody Allen noted, the ability to make a right turn on a red light.

I'm a Kansas boy, and while I am quite sure I will not spend my whole life here, I will never deny my roots. When asked, "And where are you from?" Originally, I mean, I proudly will offer up the Sunflower State.

When asked, "Kansas? Do you know Dorothy and Toto?" I proudly will make steam come out of my ears and punch the inquirer in the face so hard that his dog will cry. Toto, too.

"The Wizard of Oz" is back on the big screen, which means once again residents of the other 49 states can see Kansas in dusty black and white. Not the real Kansas, mind you, but a fabricated Kansas built by studio craftsmen on an MGM soundstage in Tinseltown.

My best friend lives in dreaded Los Angeles. A native Kansan, he has one personal rule: Every one of his California friends is allowed two "Wizard of Oz" jokes without penalty. Then things get ugly. It serves as a Get Out of Jail Free card in the field of pop culture references.

It is ridiculous that one cannot cross state lines without hearing someone pay homage to the film in order to establish an interpersonal frame of reference, as if we are supposed to say, "Yeah, well, I knew Dorothy before she got popular. Everybody likes her now that she's sold out," or "Yes, our black-and-white farm house is actually uprooted by a twister every spring." It's as if we don't speak English but by speaking louder and more slowly to us, we will eventually understand what they are talking about.

However, the biggest frustration is that the movie itself is so damn good. It would be easy to renounce association with a bad Jean-Claude Van Damme flick, but it's difficult to get indignant about being coupled with one of the best things America has ever produced, cinematically or otherwise.

"The Wizard of Oz" is more than a movie. It's an absolute cultural phenomenon. We watched it once a year on television. We know the lines. We can conjure up the songs in a heartbeat. We anticipate the cheeky Munchkins, the mean, apple-throwing trees, the nasty witch and that weird horse that changes colors.

The script rivals the average Shakespeare play for the number of phrases contributed to our everyday speech, and when the Wizard is revealed to be a crotchety old man with fortune-cookie wisdom, we learn about ourselves. Corny as hell? Probably. But, love it or hate it, it's part of our heritage.

It also seems to be our state's biggest export. "Oz" kitsch comes in every embarrassing form imaginable. The movie keeps our state's image innocent, even antiseptic. While Dorothy had the answers in her own Kansas backyard all along, even this discovery can't make Uncle Henry and Aunt Em be Technicolor.

Seeing this movie on a large screen is bittersweet for anyone who grew up watching it on television. It serves as a reminder of innocence you tried long ago to forget you compromised. The magic is still there, but your personal cynicism will be a bitter pill to swallow in the final reel.

I should not be resentful of my California friends who, through no fault of their own, believe Kansas is a windy, dusty state full of mean old spinsters who steal dogs and ride bicycles. I should not fume with anger over being associated with such a beautiful movie. I should not be too cynical to appreciate a simple, playful story.

Yet, I am a mass of such contradictions. If I only had a heart.

NU fan experiences poor sportsmanship

Editor,
First, I would like to congratulate the K-State football players and coaches on an outstanding game. Their performance not only was worthy of winning the K-State/Nebraska contest last weekend but also of being a serious contender for the national championship.

I wasn't sure if I should write this or not, because I know it will be viewed simply as a case of sour grapes. However, as fellow members of the Big 12 Conference and college students, I felt it necessary at least to give it a shot.

I was one of the relatively few Nebraska fans who made the trip to Manhattan for the game (Now I know how our opponents feel when they try to get tickets in Lincoln!). Besides a few joking comments as we walked toward the stadium in our Nebraska gear, my group and I encountered little unsportsmanlike conduct before the game. During the game, we pretty much were engulfed by Nebraska fans, so we were left with a favorable impression there, too.

After the game, however, was a different story. Let me begin by sympathizing with K-State fans, particularly students. Their team had just broken a 29-year drought when it came to beating the Huskers. Although their team was ranked higher than the opponent, some media sources still favored the Huskers to win. Those factors, plus many more, make exuberant celebrations understandable and expected.

As my group and I drove away, we went down the unfamiliar streets in search of a good place to eat. Unbeknownst to us, we were headed straight for Aggieville and into a mob of young adults — presumably students — also heading toward the party area. We watched helplessly as the mob ripped off the Nebraska flag flanking the vehicle ahead of us and beat on its sides and windows. We were equally helpless when the mob came toward our vehicle. At first, it looked as though they would pass us by; however, that lasted for only a moment as it proceeded to do the same to our vehicle.

Even this activity didn't seem too bad to me. I put myself in their shoes and felt many of my friends might have done the same. This lasted until we reached the eating establishment and discovered the antenna of our vehicle had been broken. Also, the passenger in our vehicle had his window down, and one of the fans grabbed his arm and hit him with the flag he'd ripped off the vehicle ahead of us.

I will not judge all K-State fans based on the conduct of a few. I hope those fans who were respectful and dignified will share their behavior with others because, as demonstrated here, the actions of only a few can create a bad impression for the whole.

As for the K-State players and coaches, good luck in your hunt for the national title. This Nebraska fan will be cheering for you.

Servers should leave bad attitude at home

Editor,
I am writing this letter in response to Chris Piant's column on bad tippers from the Nov. 3 Collegian.

If I understood the column correctly, he meant that giving a good tip should be an automatic portion of the bill that goes directly to the server without regard to the quality of the service provided.

I understand servers depend on tips to pay for school, rent and so on. However, do you think the public is some sort of unofficial welfare system? Are servers not required to earn their money just as everybody else is? Every once in a while, I like to take my daughter out to dinner at a sit-down restaurant. I understand small children require the server to work a little harder than they normally do for adults, so I tip more when she is with me.

However, I will not tip servers more than a penny if they cannot treat my daughter with the same respect as any other patron. A tip is not automatic, but something that has to be earned.

The column also said the public should forgive servers if they are having a bad day. How are people supposed to know if servers just are having a bad day?

Two assumptions could be made at this point: either they are having a bad day, or they have that attitude all the time. Because most people do not know their servers, the majority will assume that it is the server's normal attitude. Why does the customer have to deal with servers' bad attitudes?

If your pay is related specifically to the service you provide and the attitude with which you provide your service, leave the bad attitude at home. Anyone in the customer service industry could tell you that. ## Funding Hale Library needs to be priority

Editor,
To echo the sentiments in the Collegian regarding Hale Library funding (Our View, Nov. 4), the problem at hand is getting leadership to place priority on library serial funding.

I urge our campus leaders to roll up their sleeves and get this problem fixed. If the first plan to route money to the library from the KSU Foundation does not pan out, let's have an alternative plan ready to implement. The task force report is a blueprint that offered a variety of strategies for funding the library. This plan now requires action.

Now, we need Jon Wefald to demonstrate his leadership or magic touch again — leave us an academic legacy in the form of a "ranked" library to complement our No. 1 football squad.

Volleyball team improves to 17-8 with weekend wins

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's volleyball team defeated two conference foes Friday and Saturday night at Ahearn Field House to improve to 17-8 on the season and 10-1 at home. The Wildcats knocked off the Missouri Tigers on Friday in four games, 10-15, 15-12, 15-13, 15-8.

The Wildcats faced the Cyclones on Saturday and beat them in record time. It took only 44 minutes to do it, and it became the shortest match in K-State history.

Head coach Jim McLaughlin said he was happy about defeating Missouri, just not the way they accomplished it.

"We played well when we had to play," McLaughlin said. "That's great, and we showed we could come back."

"I've always believed that it's the sign of a good team when you don't play well and you find a way to win. And that's exactly what we did Friday night," he said. "I thought that was the only positive side. You know, when you're preparing for a tournament and you're preparing to make a run in a tournament, you have to play well from beginning to end."

The win by the Tigers in game one was the first in a four-year stretch against K-State. It ended a Wildcat 21-game win streak over the Tigers.

K-State dominated early in game two, only to let the Tigers come back and take the lead, 10-9. After tying the game at 10 with a block, the Wildcats hung a 5-1 run on the Tigers to win.

"We got more and more into a groove, but we can't wait too long to get into that groove," McLaughlin said.

"There is no reason why we can't be in sync from the beginning whistle, and I've seen us do it. I saw us do it at Colorado. We were in sync the whole time. We put pressure on them."

"Missouri put pressure on us at first, but we got in sync and put pressure on them. Then, the match was over," he said.

K-State came back and downed the Cyclones on Saturday night in efficient fashion — 44 minutes to be exact.

"We played well," McLaughlin said. "They knew they had to after the Missouri match."

Winning at home has become common this year. The Wildcats are 10-1 on the home court and have the 11th highest attendance in the country this season. Three of K-State's next four opponents are ranked, but McLaughlin said he was more concerned with the team's motion going into a run for the national tournament than the upcoming opponents' records.

"I'm more concerned with the rhythm we're in and how well we're playing," McLaughlin said. "I feel pretty good at this point in time. We just have to play well the next two weeks."

Broncos beat Chiefs, 30-7

■ Denver becomes 1st team to go 10-0 since '91.

By DAVE GOLDBERG
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — John Elway? Bubba Brister? Who cares? Whoever plays quarterback for the Denver Broncos, they look like they could be on the way to the NFL's first unbeaten season in 26 years.

The 36-year-old Brister, reborn as Elway's backup, ran 38 yards for a touchdown on the first series, then Terrell Davis went 41 yards for a score and the Broncos went on to a 30-7 win over Kansas City on Monday night.

The victory made the Broncos the first 10-0 team in the NFL since the 1991 Washington Redskins and put them on track for a Dec. 21 confrontation in Miami with the Dolphins, who in 1972 were the last NFL team to go unbeaten.

"If we do what we're supposed to do and we don't have any major injuries, I don't see why we can't do it," Brister said.

Kansas City coach Marty Schottenheimer, who said he was "embarrassed and humiliated" by five personal fouls committed by his team on Denver's last drive, agreed.

"In my view, they have a very, very good chance to do that and that's not easy," said Schottenheimer, whose team lost its fifth straight, the first time in his 10 seasons in Kansas City that the Chiefs have lost more than three in a row.

Brister finished 13-of-23 for 180 yards. Davis, who leads the NFL in rushing, carried 18 times for 111 yards and Brister added 53 more on five carries as Denver ran for 211 yards.

The Broncos' defense, meanwhile, held the Chiefs to 31 yards on the ground.

"I don't feel like a backup," said Brister, who had 71 starts for Pittsburgh, Philadelphia and the Jets over 10 seasons before sitting out 1996 then joining the Broncos last year.

"I've always felt like a starter, but there's only one of them, and I've had guys like Boomer Esiason and John Elway ahead of me."

Kansas City, (4-6), which looked before the season like the most dangerous threat to the Broncos in both the AFC West and AFC as a whole, looked like a dispirited bunch against the Broncos, who now have outscored opponents 114-13 in first quarters this season. By the end of the game, they were out of control — penalties basically gave the Broncos their final touchdown.

"The way we permitted the fourth quarter to go is as great a disappointment as I've ever had in my coaching career," Schottenheimer said.

"I'm apologizing to you, to this community, to the nation."

It took just 2:42 for Denver to take a 7-0 lead, on the bootleg around right end by Brister, now 4-0 as a starter in place of Elway, who is nursing pulled rib muscles.

The next score was even quicker — a 79-yard drive that took only three plays and 1:05 and was capped by the burst by Davis.

That was the game.

The Chiefs cut it to 14-7 on an 87-yard drive that consumed almost 8 minutes of the second quarter and was capped by a 3-yard TD pass to Kimble Anders from Rich Gannon, filling in for the benched Elvis Grbac.

But Jason Elam added 42 and 46-yard field goals before the half and a 35-yarder in the third quarter. Things officially ended with 7:36 left in the game when Gannon, who finished 26-of-39 for 224 yards, tripped and fell at the 20 on a fourth down at the Denver 10.

"We ran 19 times for 31 yards and we wanted to run 35 times for 200 yards," Gannon said. "We have too much talent in the locker room to be playing the way we are. The mistakes and the penalties are killing us."

Derrick Loville added a final TD for the Broncos on a 1-yard run at the end of the drive in which the Chiefs had five personal fouls, three by Derrick Thomas. The Chiefs finished with 13 penalties for 137 yards.

WINNING UGLY

■ Men's team sluggish in 1st half, but cruises to 72-51 victory.

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"That was truly a Nov. 16 game," K-State men's basketball coach Tom Asbury said, referring to the early-season mistakes and 9-32 first-half shooting the Cats committed during a 72-51 victory over Cal State Fullerton on Monday night.

"We just weren't very good in the first half," Asbury said. "But that will give us a lot of things to work on."

Poor shooting plagued both teams in the first half. The Cats entered halftime shooting just 31 percent from the field but shot 46 percent from beyond the 3-point line.

"We were just sluggish as we could be offensively," Asbury said.

Conceding his team doesn't really have any excuses, Asbury said the Cats just needed to improve from the field and the free-throw line, where the Cats also struggled.

"We couldn't make a foul shot to save our life," Asbury said. "Which is incredible, because we've got much better foul shooters than that."

Defensively the Cats played well, holding the Tigers to just 27-percent shooting for the game.

At one point in the first half, the Tigers' shooting percentage from beyond the 3-point line nearly doubled their field-goal percentage.

Coming off the bench, freshman guard Josh Kimm sparked the team in the first half. Kimm connected on four of six from 3-point range, adding four of six from field goal range as well. Without Kimm's performance, the Cats shot just five of 26 from the field in the first half. Kimm lead the team in scoring with 15 points.

"I have shot a lot of threes throughout my whole career in high school and college," Kimm said. "It's the same dimensions here as it was in Cedar Rapids."

Forward Shawn Rhodes said that Kimm's performance would only continue to help open up the opposing team's defense.

"He's playing huge right now for a freshman," Rhodes said. "We're really happy about how he's playing."

"People start realizing that he's a good perimeter shooter, and that's gonna open some things up."

In the second half, the Cats shooting percentage improved to 53 percent, evening out their shooting at 40 percent for the game.

Inside, the Cats won the battle of the boards. K-State outrebounded the Tigers by 23 and were led by Tony Kitt, who had nine.

The Cats take a day off and return to the court at 8 p.m. Wednesday in Bramlage Coliseum against Washburn.

May makes surprise decision, returns to finish senior campaign with Cats

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Almost as if he had risen from the dead, senior guard Ayome "Paco" May returned to the K-State men's basketball team Monday night after a two week hiatus.

On Nov. 2, K-State Sports Information reported that May left the team for good because of a recurring intestinal problem. Coming as a surprise to everyone but his coach and teammates, May returned to the team to play in last night's game against Cal State Fullerton.

May played for 19 minutes like an uninjured man, pouring in 11 points and grabbing three steals.

On Saturday, May told Coach

Tom Asbury that he would like to return to the team.

"I just wanted to finish my last year out," May said. "Basically, all Coach said was 'see you in practice.' I've been feeling this way for a long time. I just wanted to end my senior season."

May said his injury comes and goes, but it was all right for the most part against the Tigers.

"At the end of the game, I got real tired," he said. "But for the most part, I felt pretty good."

Asbury said May's return was a little unexpected.

"I was a little surprised," he said.

"I didn't anticipate it at all. I think Paco's condition was just killing him mentally. He told me 'Coach, I can't play with this. I'm just miserable. I can't eat or sleep.' I think it just wore him down mentally and physically."

May wouldn't go into the specifics of his condition, but he said it involved discomfort and fatigue.

"He's a great kid," Asbury said. "You have to feel for a kid that goes through that kind of thing. He'll really help this team. I'm glad he's back."

K-State forward Nicky Ramage looks to pass the ball during the second half against Ohio State Monday night in Bramlage Coliseum. The Wildcats fell to the Buckeyes 62-63.

Women's team loses opener to Ohio State

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Despite playing with three injured players and giving up 28 turnovers, the K-State women's basketball team took Big 10 opponent Ohio State to the wire before falling 63-62 in their home opener.

The Cats had a chance to triumph at the end, but sophomore guard Kim Woodlee's last-minute jumper fell short at the buzzer.

"This team really performed well," Coach Deb Patterson said. "I saw real positive things with a team that is really trying to overcome tremendous adversity."

Freshman point guard Essence Perry played with a fractured wrist she sustained in Friday's exhibition game, while both Woodlee and senior guard Jenny Coalson played with nagging injuries.

Junior forward Nicky Ramage helped to relieve the injury-plagued Cats by tying a career-high 27 points and pulling down eight rebounds. Junior center Angie Finkes chipped in with 12 points and four boards.

"I just wanted to go out and win. That was my main objective," Ramage said.

With Ramage exploding for eight points in the first 10 minutes, the Cats started off strong, leading the Buckeyes 20-10 midway through the first half. But All-Big 10 selection Larecha Jones responded with eight points to cut the lead to four.

Ohio State point guard Jamie Lewis hit a three at the buzzer at the end of the first half to cut into a seven-point Wildcat lead and end the half down 34-30.

K-State started the second half sluggish, as the Buckeyes capitalized on several Cat turnovers to take their first lead with 15 minutes to go.

"They came out a little more aggressive than us," Ramage said. "But I think we picked up the intensity."

Ohio State kept the lead until Ramage poured in a deuce to tie the game at 51 with six minutes to go. From there, the Cats went on a 11-3 run until Lewis and Jones responded with offense to put Ohio State up for good with 16 seconds to go.

"Ohio State is a great defensive team, real aggressive," Patterson said. "They had an intense competitive mentality, and we didn't come out and execute in the second half."

The Wildcats will try to bounce back from the loss when they take on Eastern Kentucky at 6 p.m. Wednesday in Bramlage Coliseum.

WINTER BLUES

Students can combat seasonal depression by increasing activity

By ERIN MCGLINN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Besides all the holiday jazz that accompanies wintertime, changes in weather also come with the seasonal package. Shorter days, overcast skies and subzero temperatures are present and often depressing.

Seasonal Affective Disorder, commonly known as the "winter blues," affects millions each season. Luckily, there are some ways to battle the natural phenomenon.

"People in Kansas are more susceptible to the weather because they are used to the sunshine," said Ann Johnson, University Counseling Services therapist.

Originally from Maine, Johnson described the New England climate as having sunlight rarely, with cloudy days accepted as the norm.

"Seasonal Affective Disorder, or SAD, are the changes associated with the prevalence of winter and vary according to latitude, age and sex. Statistically, young females living in high latitudes are the most vulnerable to SAD," she said.

Johnson said Seasonal Affective Disorder is difficult to diagnose and hard to distinguish from depression. The characteristics of SAD include severe fatigue, sleep and appetite changes, reduced concentration, carbohydrate craving, weight gain and low self-esteem.

Consequently, students who might become bothered by SAD sometimes suffer academically.

"Typically, affected students require lots of sleep to counteract the fatigue," Johnson said. "Many times, they'll sleep in during the mornings instead of going to class."

Patty Mayo, patient therapist at Pawnee Mental Health Services, said patients really start to surface around October.

"Usually when daylight-savings time arrives is when people begin to experience symptoms," she said. "Although many simply go untreated, Seasonal Affective Disorder is a common ailment with which we are faced."

Mayo said SAD is related to the amount of light exposure one receives.

"Our bodies naturally respond to seasonal changes," she said. "Emotionally, the dreary, dark skies cause increased depression and sluggishness. It's almost like we go into hibernation."

Treatments tend to revolve either around changes in lifestyle or a more technical approach, depending on the severity.

"Increased activity, more exposure to light and reduction of heavy carbohydrates will minimize the symptoms of Seasonal Affective Disorder for the less severe cases," Mayo said.

Mayo said she advises exercising regularly, establishing regular sleeping habits that increase time spent in the morning, and eating lots of fruits and vegetables.

However, for the more severe cases, a therapeutic device known as a light box can aid the victim.

"The light box is a unit, which houses a specific beam of light, delivering effects very similar to natural sunlight," Mayo said. "This gives the patient's body the impression they are not deprived of the natural light."

Jay Rapley, senior in biology and pre-medicine, said he usually is not affected by the cold seasonal changes. "The loss of sunlight in the winter causes your body to produce different hormones, and then your moods change," he said. "Because of that, I force myself to exercise in the wintertime. If I go running or something, I gain extra energy with the runner's high."

Rapley said he thinks SAD revolves around self-image.

"Exercising, going to tanning beds — just about anything that changes and makes someone feel better about their appearance will help fix the problem of seasonal depression," he said.

Unfortunately, there is no way to change the weather forecasts. However, as far as winter blues and gloomy moods are concerned, changes in lifestyle can help improve enjoyment of the season.

New products designed to help students study

■ Alertness, concentration levels increase with use.

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

With final exams a scant month away, most students would do just about anything to lighten their work loads.

With this in mind, the Brain Sync Corp. has introduced its line of thought-enhancing and mood-creating products.

The Brain Sync plan revolves around the idea that certain brain waves can be guided by sounds. By listening to a particular sound pattern, different brain waves will respond, depending on the beat. Through the Brain Wave Audio Technology, the company's founders say cognitive thinking and creativity can be improved.

A wide variety of compact discs, cassettes and videos are featured in the Brain Sync brochure and catalog. Each compilation is designed to allow the listener "to reach truly nourishing states of being that directly nurture your sense of self, your creativity and the dynamic expression of your power."

Detailed descriptions of each selection allow perspective buyers to choose which brain frequencies they wish to tweak.

While beta waves control alertness and concentration (best for studying), alpha waves affect creativity levels, theta waves assist in meditation and a "healing sleep" can be reached through delta waves. Whether you want to stop smoking, free yourself from guilt or lose weight, Brain Sync might offer an easy way out.

One selection, "Brain Power," is a 60-minute CD that guarantees the listener an inner peace and confidence that will lead to a better score on tomorrow's test. The only thing the "music" (as the disc cover calls it) guarantees is the longest hour of the listener's life.

As an orchestra warms up, there is a combination of notes that creates a sort of humming. The sounds of "Brain Power" are a cross between this strange humming and a kind of low, creepy chanting. Studying is even more difficult than usual because of the distracting weirdness of this CD.

With the added disadvantage of costs upward of $20, it seems less troublesome to crack a book rather than purchase a Sync selection.

Besides, success in any area of life takes a little more work than listening to one CD.

Music tells story of love, mystery in 'Meet Joe Black'

By SARAH FLORIE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

With original music composed and conducted by Thomas Newman, the soundtrack to the motion picture "Meet Joe Black," starring Brad Pitt, Anthony Hopkins and Claire Forlani, combines gorgeous orchestration with classic favorites.

The music in the soundtrack definitely tells a story. The full orchestra plays gorgeous original works, along with a few other songs, that seem to tell a story — a story that begins with innocence, progresses toward mystery and want, and ends with love.

The recurring theme in the album begins with the song "Walkaway," in which majestic flutes play along with the truly elegant orchestra.

This composition has all the essentials of a movie theme song. It's powerful and awe-inspiring, but with a delicate quality that makes you want to listen to it over and over.

Traces of the theme song can be heard in the songs "Cold Lamb Sandwich" and "That Next Place."

The soundtrack, as well as a beautiful original score, contains the big band slow-dancing tunes "Cheek to Cheek" and "Let's Face the Music and Dance," both written by Irving Berlin.

The climax of the album is an absolutely grand rendition of "What a Wonderful World," written by George Weiss and Bob Thiele and arranged and conducted by Chris Boardman. This new arrangement of an old favorite proves to be a song that evokes a feeling of pure class when played.

The last track on "Meet Joe Black" is an intertwining of two classics, "Somewhere Over the Rainbow" and "What a Wonderful World." It is performed by Israel Kamakawiwo'ole.

This acoustic, tropical-sounding version of these tunes wraps up the compact disc in a superb way by relaxing the mind so all listeners are able to hear is the music's beauty.

U.S., Clinton ready to test Iraqi promises

By TERENCE HUNT
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Skeptical that Saddam Hussein will keep his word, the White House pressed for a swift test of Iraqi promises to cooperate with U.N. arms inspectors. The United States stopped its military buildup in the Persian Gulf but warned it could strike at a moment's notice.

"The world is watching Saddam Hussein to see if he follows the words he uttered with deeds," President Clinton said Monday. "Our forces remain strong and ready if he does not."

Reinforcing Clinton's statement, National Security Adviser Sandy Berger said that if Iraq does not comply, "there will be plenty of opportunity for military force."

The administration said it would be up to U.N. chief arms inspector Richard Butler and his team to judge whether Iraq, in fact, allows unrestricted access to all sites the inspectors choose. "He's not been shy in the past about expressing his views when he believes his work has been obstructed," said White House press secretary Joe Lockhart. Butler is to return to Iraq on Tuesday.

The White House also resumed plans for a presidential trip at midweek to Japan, South Korea and Guam that had been put off as the United States moved toward attacking Iraq.

Speaking to reporters, Clinton said the best outcome would be to get the inspectors back on the job with unfettered access and full cooperation.

Since the Gulf War, U.N. inspectors have forced Iraq to destroy 40,000 chemical weapons, 700 tons of chemical weapons agents, a biological weapons plant, 48 missiles and 30 warheads fitted for chemical and biological weapons, Clinton said.

"Governments all over the world today stand united in sharing the conviction that full compliance — and nothing short of full compliance — is needed from Iraq," Clinton said.

A CBS News poll released Monday showed a majority of Americans supported the U.S. decision to abort the attack on Iraq. According to the poll, 54 percent of the American public agreed with the decision to hold back on a strike, but 39 percent felt the United States should have taken action.

Berger made the rounds of television talk shows to make the case that Clinton had assembled the strongest consensus against Iraq since the Gulf War. He said Butler and his professional staff are in the best position to evaluate Iraqi compliance and set deadlines for producing documents about weapons programs.

"We certainly hope that they will move as expeditiously as possible," Berger said.

"I believe they will."

The administration said Butler would not be able to render an immediate verdict. "It's going to take some time for them to go in and for them to continue on with their testing and establish whether they believe that Saddam Hussein is in compliance," Lockhart said.

Berger said he agreed. "We have to, obviously, be very skeptical," about Iraq's intentions, Berger said.

Defense Secretary William Cohen, announced a halt in the U.S. military buildup. "We will keep the forces that are already there for the time being," Cohen said. "Those forces that did not yet arrive, will in all probability be recycled back in the next several days."

Several dozen F-16 and F-15 fighter planes, along with four F-117 stealth fighters, have been diverted to Europe and are expected to be ordered back home.

About 4,000 Army troops at Fort Stewart, Ga., and Fort Bliss, Texas, that had been designated for deployment also will stand down, the secretary said.

Those forces will be ready to go at a moment's notice if Iraq violates its promises, Cohen said. "No more hiding and seeking, and no more playing games" with the U.N. inspectors.

Berger said, "We have all the forces that we need in the Gulf to take the most severe attack, the most severe military action we need."

BLUE KEY

Buller said Blue Key's focus is on service and leadership. She said the organization started the leadership day because it saw it as an area that needed to be recognized.

"It keeps us in-tune with other leaders on campus," Buller said.

Blue Key will be honoring organization advisers through its Adviser's Luncheon from 11:30 a.m. to 12:30 p.m. in the Ramada Plaza Hotel Ballroom. Scott said Blue Key wanted to honor advisers because they do so much and rarely are recognized for their efforts.

"Each club representative will have a chance to stand up during the luncheon and recognize their adviser," Pope said.

Each club and living group on campus also was asked to nominate an outstanding student leader to attend the Student Leadership Dessert from 5:30 p.m. to 6:30 p.m. in Hale Library's Hemisphere Room.

The dessert precedes Franklin's all-campus address at 7 p.m. in McCain Auditorium.

Franklin is the vice president of the National Center for Fathering in Kansas City, Kan. He was K-State's assistant dean of student life from 1990 to 1996. Scott said his emphasis as assistant dean was K-State's leadership programs.

Scott said Franklin recently traveled to Africa and has been to Latin America. His topic will focus on leadership in other cultures.

"He is a phenomenal speaker," Scott said. "He is someone really special to hear — anything but dry."

As a K-State student, Franklin was the first African-American student body president, member of the Delta Upsilon fraternity, a Haymaker Hall residence assistant and Homecoming king.

"He was 'Mr. Everything' at K-State," Scott said.

GOAL POST

more flexible. The design was based on airplane wings. It was supposed to bend, not break," he said.

Cavello said the engineers of the goal post were shocked to see the post come down. They are flying to Manhattan after the Kansas State High School Championship game this weekend to examine the goal post and its remains.

They plan to make improvements for the next design.

"They were sold to us under the guarantee that they were completely indestructible," Cavello said.

"They're going to replace it at no cost for us. They're standing by their guarantee."

The pair of goal posts cost K-State $29,000 dollars. They were installed during the week of the Kansas game on Oct. 31, while people were out of town or at home watching the game.

"We were concerned with the safety of our fans," Cavello said.

"Cost wasn't a factor when it relates to our fan's safety. We were very, very aware that the goal posts might come down.

"We did it in secrecy so that we wouldn't produce bulletin material for Nebraska. We didn't want to disrespect the Nebraska program in just assuming we would win. We did what we had to do. We did it out of respect of Nebraska."

The athletic department said it appreciates the fan support but said it feels the team and coaching staff should get the first choice of determining the way the goal post is handled.

"The decision will be made by the administration, Director (Max) Urick, Coach (Bill) Snyder," Cavello said. "If they would like a trophy in their trophy room, then afterwards we'll take care of everyone else. We understand the fans' excitement and appreciate what it means to the people in our community. It was a community victory, but the team went out and earned it."

Cavello said the athletic department would like full cooperation in finding the stolen pieces of the goal post.

"We would like for folks to help us out with this," Cavello said.

"It is all appreciated. That's what makes this the great game it is. It's really all for the team."

"Do it for them."

SAFERIDE

is looking into funding the program, much like the Saturn corporation funds the University of Southern California's version.

The success of the SafeRide program led KU Student Senate to form Campus BLAST, Building Local Alternatives for Safe Transportation. This program is divided into two parts — SafeRide and the new Hand 'Em Over to Someone Sober campaign. With Hand 'Em Over, designated drivers are provided with free non-alcoholic beverages in participating Lawrence drinking establishments. Bumper stickers and keychains are made available by Student Senate to identify students as sober drivers.

As the number of KU's SafeRide passengers increase, so do possible benefits for a K-State version of the program. Sergeant Stanley Conkwright, Riley County Police officer in special projects, said the entire city of Manhattan could use the service.

"Anything that helps save lives and keeps people from being injured is worthwhile," Conkwright said.

"However, I think it should extend to the entire community. Students aren't the only ones out drinking."

This semester, an SGA special committee has been established to research the SafeRide program. The main purpose of the committee is to study successful versions of the program around the country and to assess the student body's need for it, student senate chair Gabe Eckert said.

"We're just in the researching stage right now," Eckert said. "We have to see how to initiate this type of program and how it works. This is not definite."

The committee will hand in its final report to Eckert and Student Body President Tracey Mann in February 1999; decisions and suggestions will follow.

Eckert said that if the plan is used, it could be more than a year or two before the SafeRide service could be established.

would show up to help collect. She said she assumed they instead opted to stand in line early to enter the stadium or watch ESPN "College GameDay."

"We knew we couldn't help the date, because America Recycles Day was Saturday, also," Meredith said. "We knew it would turn out perfect or terrible."

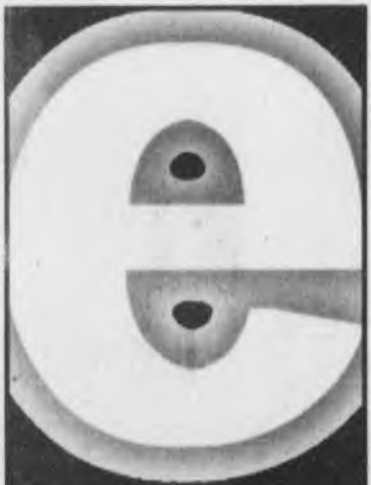

The weeklong recycling effort that Meredith and Student Body President Tracey Mann initiated with nearly twelve colleges and universities did bring in some aluminum from many Manhattan residents. More than 500 pounds were sold to Howie's Recycling, with the proceeds going to Flint Hills Breadbasket. The results from the other schools were not available at press time.

Janet Parrish, Riley County Public Works recycling events coordinator, said other Manhattan recycling events also were less successful than expected.

"It would have been fine until ESPN came to town," she said. "Everyone went to the stadium early, so there wasn't as much traffic in the city parks."

Woods said K-State's America Recycles Day collection efforts have the potential for future success and that he can understand students' desires to participate in other activities that particular day.

"As it was, we didn't collect much," he said. "But if we had a better educational program so tailgaters would know to separate their cans, and we had people to pick them up, tailgaters would know to save them."

Linda Tripp audio tapes of Lewinsky released to public

By NANCY BENAC
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Finally, the voice. Monica Lewinsky's girlish excitement and pouty petulance reverberate through the Linda Tripp tapes as she dissects her improbable relationship with the president.

No valley girl-speak, here. No grim "Fatal Attraction" tones. Rather, the gush of emotion from an earnest young woman infatuated with an older man. Naive, but not quite innocent.

With precise diction, Lewinsky playfully tests come-ons to Clinton like "Dear Boo-Boo" and "You can't refuse me because I'm too cute and adorable." She chokes out her words over sobs and snuffles when things turn sour, declaring, "It is too much for any one person."

The 22 hours of tapes released Tuesday by the House Judiciary Committee gave America its first chance to hear Lewinsky's voice, one of the few remaining mysteries from a presidential morality tale that has unfolded in excruciating detail.

22 hours worth of tapes show excited, somber sides of former intern

A transcript of the words came out earlier; what was new Tuesday was the emotion and inflection. The only thing missing now is the steady stream of expletives that were deleted.

Radio and TV stations had a field day as Lewinsky's voice instantly echoed across the airwaves coast to coast. "The Tripp tapes came out today," a train conductor announced to early-morning commuters arriving at Washington's Union Station. "We will hear Monica."

From California, psychologist

Robert Butterworth offered this assessment: "It almost is like sitting down listening to 'Days of our Lives.' ... She's coming across more sympathetically and a little bit more vulnerable than I would have thought."

The White House professed disinterest.

"My guess is that most people around the country won't be paying much attention, but the people who are obsessed with this story, this will be a day in heaven for them," spokesman Joe Lockhart said.

Rep. Louise Slaughter, D-N.Y., dismissed the tapes as "two ditsy ladies talking about stupid things."

The tapes secretly were recorded by Lewinsky's onetime friend and co-worker, who turned them over to Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr, triggering the 10-month investigation that spawned an impeachment inquiry.

Tripp's low, throaty monotones offer a counterpoint to the bounce and varied pitch of her young friend's voice. A

CLEANING UP OUR ACT

A row of Ford F-250 trucks waits to be modified with fuel and exhaust systems at the Transportation Design and Manufacturing plant. The total time it takes for a car or truck to be modified is about 10 hours.

Company modifies vehicles to operate on natural gas or propane

STORY BY MIKE WATSON
PHOTOGRAPHS BY IVAN KOZAR

Manhattan became home to Transportation Design and Manufacturing a little more than two years ago. The company, a division of Troy Design and Manufacturing in Michigan, opened in Manhattan in May 1996 with 11 employees. Since then, TDM has grown, operating with about 80 employees.

"TDM modifies the fuel and exhaust systems of gasoline vehicles to run off of compressed natural gas or propane. Natural gas exhaust is 95-percent cleaner to run than gasoline," John Pagen, business planning manager, said.

TDM was the first Economic Development Fund recipient. This award helped defray costs of building its facility and equipping it with the latest technology, Ron Fehr, assistant city manager, said. TDM has received $975,000 in grants and $418,000 in loans.

The 60,000-square-foot production area houses seven workstations, Pagen said.

Each station takes about 30 minutes. Total time for modification for a single car is around 10 hours after quality checks, he said.

"Each person checks the work that was done before them," Pagen said. "We have documented records of all processes to make sure that all problems are taken care of."

TDM looks to raise employment in Manhattan with increased production.

The company's goal for employment is to bring 100 to 200 jobs to Manhattan within eight years, Fehr said. Using 1996 as the base year, the company is a quarter of the way there.

"They are basically right on target to meet that goal," he said.

Factors exist that make compressed natural gas more desirable and practical. "Kansas has an abundance of natural gas," Fehr said.

Natural gas is cheaper and more efficient. We're working on creating a public refueling station to make sales more appealing. Plans for operation are set for the middle of 1999.

There are a couple of problems standing in the way of natural gas becoming the primary source of fuel, Pagen said.

"One of the problems is that gas is so cheap, relatively speaking," he said. "Gas is cheaper than it has been, and that will make it harder to get people to switch."

There are mandates within city, state and federal governments increasing the production and usage for alternative fuel vehicles; however, there have been no mandates for public usage.

The key to making the jump from fuel pumps to compressed natural gas pumps is setting a standard for citizens to follow, Ryan Zahner, TDM mechanical engineer, said.

"When more people become aware of natural gas vehicles, the more apt they are to buy one," Pagen said. "It's hard to get the word out, because there are so many more things competing for people's time."

TDM has mass produced vehicles, working with Ford Motor Co. to modify the F-150, F-250 and the Contour, Pagen said. "We can do dozens of them a day," he said. "Some lines takes longer than others do. One time we were so busy that we worked 24 hours. We never closed. That's when we were building up '98 production. Now we're working on '99."

Not only does TDM work with manufacturing for Ford, but it also is doing some engineering of its own. One attempt at engineering work is the "Water Hog."

"The 'Water Hog' is a design from Ireland that has come to us for U.S. use," Zahner said. "It's a water-removal machine to use on football fields and soccer fields — any place that water pumps can't get to."

K-State engineering students are prime candidates for making designs for TDM when engineering becomes an integral part of the operation.

"We're trying to expand there and do more engineering work," Zahner said. "Right now, we're more of a production facility. If engineering was a main focus at TDM, the main pool would be from KSU to get the skills that are needed."

TDM already has assisted students in the College of Engineering with a solar car project working with aerodynamics. They are not No. 1, but they soon will be with help from TDM, Zahner said.

By working with the "Water Hog" and K-State's solar car, TDM looks to do some more work of its own in engineering. It has a couple of more designs still in production.

"TDM has teamed up with the city of Manhattan to put together a group to help make Manhattan a clean city. The Clean City Coalition has set out to protect the ecological integrity of the community," Fehr said.

A compressed natural gas tank is added to cars at the Transportation Design and Manufacturing plant. The tank can be refueled with natural gas or propane. The cars are fitted so they can run on either natural gas or gasoline.

Dropout rate for freshmen is declining

■ 5 of 6 Regents schools, including K-State, see rate decrease from 1994 to 1996.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Fewer first-time freshmen are dropping out at five of the state's six universities, a new report suggests.

The report said that at all institutions except Fort Hays State University, the dropout rate for the 1996 freshman class was lower than it was for the 1994 class. At K-State, the rate dropped from 25.3 percent to 22.8 percent.

University officials note their institutions have started programs designed to keep freshmen in college, though they acknowledged they cannot do much if a student leaves for financial or personal reasons.

Kim Wilcox, regents director of academic affairs, also said the state's high schools are phasing in pre-college courses because of new admission standards that will take effect for freshmen entering in

Commission allocates funds to city chamber

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan City Commission's meeting Tuesday focused on funding a group accustomed to selling the image of Manhattan to others.

The meeting was marked by the unanimous approval to establish Manhattan's 1999 contracts with the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce and a Fort Riley consultant.

The city of Manhattan gives the Chamber of Commerce money to bring in new businesses to Manhattan.

The chamber's funds total $544,000, with $120,000 toward its Industrial Promotion Fund, $402,000 toward the Tourism and Convention Contract, and Manhattan and Junction City's $19,000 contribution for the Fort Riley consultant.

CNS finds temporary fix for problems with Unix

By LAURAN COWDREY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two weeks ago, a temporary solution of the Unix system was installed to fix the continued problem of slowness, said Harvard Townsend, interim director of Computing and Network Services.

Townsend said the problem with Unix is that the 27,000 mailboxes are stored in a single directory, and because more people are sending larger e-mails with attachments and images, it was slowing down the system.

"CNS systems administrators researched the cause of the slowdown and determined that it was due to an increase in the amount of data that was being written to the disk drive that stores the 27,000 mailboxes," Townsend said.

To fix the problem, a new file system was installed into the e-mail system and is now more efficient.

K-State's Internet server was upgraded last year instead of Unix. Townsend said that at the time, Internet use was greater, and CNS had not anticipated a need to upgrade the Unix system.

BIG 12 TITLE GAME TICKETS
K-STATE VS. TEXAS A&M
3:30 p.m., Dec. 5 — St. Louis

Ten percent of K-State's allotment of tickets for the 1998 Dr Pepper Big 12 Conference Football Championship Game has been set aside for students. Student tickets are available for the game at the K-State Athletics Ticket Office from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Friday through Nov. 25. Students may purchase one ticket per valid ID (one ID per student). Tickets cost $20 or $60. Director of Athletics Max Urlick indicated the $20 tickets are being offered as a choice for students who do not want to purchase the $60 tickets in K-State's original allotment. The Big 12 Football Championship Game is scheduled for 3:30 p.m. Dec. 5 at the Trans World Dome in St. Louis.

Hale Library offers tours to meet needs of specific groups

Hale Library tours now are being planned according to specific groups, said Jan Crow, assistant to the dean of marketing and public relations.

She said the change was made to meet the needs of each group or person. "It's specific tours for specific people," she said.

The groups are specialized to include both on- and off-campus organizations. They include alumni groups, social groups and high school tours. All disciplines are covered as well. Molly Royse, subject specialist assigned to sociology, said.

Royse said each group is assigned a specialist who handles tours and targets the group's needs.

For example, a sociology professor could call Royse and she would set up a tour of all aspects in the library that dealt with sociology. This specialization would not waste students' time on sections of the library that are irrelevant to their class.

Groups such as alumni, social groups and high school classes will receive a general and overall tour that briefly covers the library.

If groups or K-State classes are interested in setting up a library tour and are unaware of the specialist they need to contact, Crow said to call the reception desk at the library and a receptionist will transfer the call to the subject specialist in the appropriate area.

For further information, a book called "The Guide to Library Services" was published last week, Crow said. It contains the names of specific subject areas and materials and will answer many target reference questions.

67 orange cones taken during win celebration; police want them back

The Riley County Police Department is declaring this week Cone Amnesty Week in an effort to recover orange cones taken after K-State defeated Nebraska on Saturday.

Lt. Gary Grubbs, RCPD, said 67 orange cones were taken during the victory celebration over the weekend.

"Several were seen on the heads of people," he said.

He said the loss totals about $850.

Students can return the cones to the RCPD at 600 Colorado St., or they can call to tell the locations of the cones. The department would be happy to pick them up, Grubbs said.

No questions will be asked when people return cones or call in about them, Grubbs said.

Clinton lawyers want more time to question

WASHINGTON, D.C. — House Republicans readied an expanded witness list Tuesday as they made last-minute arrangements for impeachment hearings. President Clinton's lawyers welcomed an opportunity to cross-examine Kenneth Starr but sought more time for their questions than lawmakers allotted.

In a letter to the House Judiciary Committee, White House counsel Charles F.C. Ruff asked that Clinton's lawyers be given 90 minutes to question Starr at the opening hearing slated for Thursday. The GOP committee had allotted only a half hour.

"We believe ... it would be fair to grant us 90 minutes for questions," Ruff wrote. He said he would be joined at Thursday's hearings by White House special counsel Greg Craig and David Kendall, the president's private lawyer.

At the urging of several members of his Judiciary Committee, Chairman Henry Hyde of Illinois decided to call witnesses beyond Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr. He met with GOP committee members privately to discuss the expanded list.

Starr will be the only scheduled witness Thursday when the committee begins to hear evidence in only the third presidential impeachment inquiry in the nation's history.

On Tuesday, House sources said Starr sent the committee information on presidential friend Webster Hubbell who is under investigation by the prosecutor for receipt of possible "hush money." Starr wants to know whether payments from Clinton supporters were made to keep Hubbell silent about any possible wrongdoing by Clinton.

The sources, who commented only on condition of anonymity, said the material included grand jury testimony and tape recordings of Hubbell, made when he was in prison for bilking his former law firm and law clients. The information did not include any recommendation by Starr concerning possible impeachable conduct.

It would be up to the committee to decide whether the inquiry should be expanded to investigate whether Clinton had knowledge of the payments to Hubbell. Clinton has denied publicly any knowledge of the money.

At the committee, partisan politics intensified as the hearing neared. Democratic leader Dick Gephardt said his party members were "very upset" that Republicans planned the hearings without them — and suggested minority members might walk out if Starr ranges beyond Clinton's conduct with Monica Lewinsky.

The spokesman for committee Republicans, Samuel Stratman, said, "To date, we have gotten little cooperation from committee Democrats who are hell-bent on attacking the credibility of Starr."

The Republicans have offered Clinton's lawyers 30 minutes to cross-examine Starr at Thursday's hearing, but Democrats said they hoped to gain more time.

Clinton has not yet made a final decision on how to answer 81 questions about his conduct submitted by Hyde, according to a source close to the president. But a consensus appears to be building around the notion of providing answers that refer to the president's previous statements or testimony. It would be a strategy similar to that used by Clinton during his Aug. 17 grand jury testimony.

Tribe 1 step closer to building proposed high-stakes bingo hall

OLATHE, Kan. — The push to build a high-stakes bingo parlor on undeveloped farmland in Miami County cleared another hurdle Monday when the U.S. Department of the Interior ruled that the 35 acres was Indian reservation land.

While several obstacles remain before the eastern Kansas bingo parlor can be built, the decision "settles the (largest) question" that has stalled the project since the early 1990s, Clark D. Stewart, president of Butler National Corp., said on Monday.

For six years, Olathe-based Butler has had a contract with the Miami Tribe of Oklahoma to finance, build and manage a proposed $15 million gambling hall.

In a letter dated Nov. 10 and released by Butler on Monday, an associate solicitor with the Interior's Division of Indian Affairs wrote, "It is Indian land. The Miami Tribe now satisfies four of five factors," that are key to a finding of tribal governmental control of the land.

The lone unmet factor was that no tribal members live on the land.

The federal Bureau of Indian Affairs and the National Indian Gaming Commission long had refused to recognize the site as legitimate tribal reservation land that qualifies for gambling activities under federal law.

In 1996, the Oklahoma-based tribe allowed the tribal descendants, which had owned most of the land since 1840, to become members. The tribe sued to have its new status recognized and the land certified for gambling purposes.

Federal officials said the tribe has improved the site with a road and utilities, plus health-care information that will be given from a trailer office parked on the site.

The tribe also plans to open a retail cigarette outlet that would be exempt from taxes.

Those combined events and activities apparently satisfied federal requirements that the tribe "exercise governmental power" over the land before certifying its use for gambling.

It's up to the National Indian Gaming Commission to make the next move, Kip Kubin, the tribe's Kansas City attorney, said Monday.

The Commission must approve formally construction plans and Butler's management contract with the tribe.

EXPERIENCE

Your future employers will want it. You're definitely going to need it.
So what are you waiting for? An engraved invitation?

GET SOME NOW

Student Publications Inc. is now hiring the spring Collegian staff.

Student Publications Inc., which publishes the Kansas State Collegian and Royal Purple, is seeking reliable individuals who have initiative, journalistic skills, creativity and enthusiasm.

In return, you pick up a paycheck and valuable experience your employers want and need.

Student Pub students not only serve their fellow K-State students, but they also win top national honors in collegiate media.

In addition, students who graduate with student-publications work experience find jobs at some of the top newspapers, magazines and advertising agencies in the country. Our placement rate is 100 percent.

It's a great opportunity to get the hands-on experience you need in a great learning environment.

Your future awaits you.

What type of experience awaits you?

Glad you asked.

Some of the descriptions and positions change from semester to semester to meet the demands of an ever-changing industry, but here are some of the positions for spring semester.

Recognition-day speaker
cross-culturally Distinguished K-State graduate Bernard Franklin speaks Tuesday evening in McCain Auditorium. Franklin, a 1976 graduate, was the first African-American student body president.

Other cultures can teach America about leadership and the future of leadership, K-State alumnus Bernard Franklin said Tuesday. Franklin was the featured lecturer as part of Blue Key Honorary Society's Leadership Recognition Day.

John Pope, co-chair of Leadership Recognition Day, said Franklin, former K-State student body president and co-founder of the K-State Leadership Programs, was chosen as the keynote speaker for all of his contributions to K-State.

"He's from K-State, and he has done a lot for K-State," Pope said.

Franklin, vice president of the National Center for Fathering in Kansas City, Kan., said he came home with eight key leadership characteristics from his recent trip to Africa for research on a book he is writing on father-son relationships.

"The rest of the world has a lot to offer," he said. "Leadership is not how only Americans perceive it."

The first characteristic was authenticity.

He said in Africa what he saw was what he experienced.

"There was no attempt to hide behind clothes ... or images," he said. "It was simply a man."

Another characteristic is spiritualism. Franklin said that in America, spiritualism has been almost eliminated, but in Africa they take their spiritualism with them everywhere, from their home, to war, to the parliament.

"It is essential from long before birth to long after death," he said.

Franklin told a story of how men in Africa are not only gentlemen but gentle men as well. He said the men were caring and sensitive, and it was not uncommon for a man to hold another man's hand and say, "I want to spend more time with you."

Other characteristics he said he found included forgiveness, endurance and self-confidence.

"I thought it was interesting how he used African culture to compare American culture," said Amber Byrd, freshman in apparel and textile marketing.

Franklin said the United States has a lot to learn from other cultures as it looks ahead to the 21st century.

"What do we hope to have in the 21st century? That is the question I pose to you. What world do you want to live in?" Franklin said.

Franklin also challenged the audience to become leaders and to become more diverse individuals.

"I came to KSU, and I took on a whole new perspective," he said. "I engaged with people who did not look like me."

"I think it starts with you making a commitment tonight to be a leader of substance. Let it be said you got the finest education in the world, in the center of the country at Kansas State University."

Workshop helps students understand complicated financial aid, scholarship process

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Interested K-State and high school students had the opportunity to gather valuable financial aid and scholarship information Tuesday night.

"Show Me the Money," sponsored by the Office of Student Financial Assistance and Adult Student Services, gave students the inside track on receiving financial aid.

Lorielei Smith, a senior at Salina-Central High School, said the scholarship process can seem insurmountable. "I am pretty much overwhelmed with all of the stuff I have to go through to get scholarships," she said.

Nancy Bolsen, director of the Office of Student Life, said the rationale behind the night was to take away the mystery of scholarships and help the students.

"We're going to talk about the application process, the search process and scams," Bolsen said before the event. "Then we're going to say what pays off."

Isaac Mark, freshman in general engineering, said he came looking for information.

"I am just kind of looking to see what they got, see if there is anything else I don't already know," he said.

To start the evening, the crowd of about 360 people gathered in Union Forum Hall and heard speakers talk on a variety of topics.

Lisa Yi, senior associate director of Student Financial Assistance, told audience members to start early when applying for federal aid. Yi covered how to fill out the Free Application for Federal Student Aid form, which included being able to file the form on the World Wide Web at www.FAFSA.ed.gov.

Travis Haverkamp, freshman in business, said the information regarding technology was helpful.

"I didn't know about the Web sites and stuff that you have," Haverkamp said. "They told me a bunch of stuff like where to go to get scholarships."

The workshop also included information on scholarships and where to get them. The event's speakers suggested scholarship applicants write for the applications and call only after receiving the application if they still have questions.

The speakers also warned against scholarship scams, such as the one frequenting college campuses that claims the school or organization has a lot of unused money from last year. The company charges $800, and Yi said this is not the way to go.

She mentioned another Web site, www.fastweb.com, a free Web site that has more than 180,000 scholarships listed.

"You don't have to pay anyone to do it," Yi said. "It's gonna take a little elbow grease — about 15 minutes of your time is all it's going to take."

After the lectures, audience members visited with representatives from K-State's colleges in the Union Courtyard.

Nina Turner, assistant director of the Division of Continuing Education, she said the night seemed successful.

"So far, we've been successful for two years, and we've increased our numbers by 60," Turner said. "So I think we will continue."

After 30 years of disappointment and 30 weeks of misery in Manhattan, the mighty Wildcat has come to fruition. And a decade-long quest for a souvenir copy of the Kansas State Collegian stadium issue that commemorates one of the greatest Wildcat football games ever played is finally over. Remember the little things that made you a Wildcats fan? What were you doing the day Kansas State finally defeated Nebraska? Maybe you were part of the crowd that celebrated a victory at K-State Stadium and your parents. Or maybe you were the one who was defensive about the Wildcats. Perhaps you're the one who remembers the emotion of the purple and white field as Coach Bill Snyder and the rest of the purple and white crowd paid one last salute to the class of 1998. Maybe you'll remember the look in Michael Bishop's eyes after he turned a college game wrong and the Big Red crowd that has played the K-State program. Regardless of the memories ingrained in your memory, the 33rd meeting of these two schools, one thing should remain clear: On the second weekend of November, a new era began. K-State defeated Nebraska.

OUR VIEW

Distance education courses give students additional chances

Nobody on the Collegian editorial board ever will take a distance education course.

That isn't because we aren't allowed to take one, or that we don't like the teachers or because the classes cost too much. Rather, we believe they might be one of the most helpful academic programs the university offers.

We just doubt our discipline.

Distance education courses are offered through the K-State Division of Continuing Education.

They are classes that require very little in-class work — rather, a distance education class is based entirely outside of the classroom. It's entirely homework, so to speak.

You see, the philosophy of a distance education course is that some students have serious conflicts with the format of classes at K-State. They are inhibited by jobs, families, domain and numerous schedule conflicts.

Distance education courses aid students by giving them the option of studying and learning at their own pace and at their own time. Distance courses are distributed either through the mail — by videotape, audiotape or through the Internet.

The cost is about $90 per credit hour for in-state students, but other costs will add up depending on the choice the student makes for presentation. For instance, the use of Telnet 2, a live video-conferencing network in Kansas, requires a payment of as much as $35 extra for three credit hours of course work. For video and audiotapes, the cost can be as much as an extra $75 per semester. The classes are rarely closed, and tests usually are handled by an adviser who is in the area of a distance education student.

Of course, doing your own work in this manner would require a great deal of patience and self-motivation, but the benefits are apparent. Just think: If you need to leave to go to a doctor's appointment, you can put your class on pause. If you want to review for a test, all of your lectures are in a file somewhere on your computer. If you need to drive somewhere, just pop in your audiotape and listen to your class.

There are certain disadvantages beyond the motivational requirement, although. For instance, if you needed help on your homework, a plastic tape or an electronic message won't help you any more than a chair or a loaf of bread. Inanimate objects don't tend to be very responsive to questions.

Granted, everything has its weaknesses. Continuing Education has made it possible, however, to keep close contact with its instructors. Many will either call or e-mail their students several times a semester to make certain they are progressing well. Many will reply promptly to questions, whether it be via e-mail or by telephone, and many enjoy the opportunities they receive by teaching distance learning classes.

Certainly, the objective of this program is to offer a K-State educational experience to a variety of students in a variety of places. It might be one of the best ways we affect our community and our state. The options can be tailored to the preference of the student — that's why the Division of Continuing Education encourages students to take distance learning courses.

If you are interested in learning more about distance education, go online to the Division of Continuing Education Web page at www.dce.ksu.edu. If what you see sounds like something you could handle, then we encourage you to give it a shot.

The editorial board, however, is sticking to more traditional methods of learning.

At least for the time being.

OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. The editorial board consists of Collegian editors and other staff members. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

PROCRASTINATION THEORY

Since school takes a back seat in November, here's something to nibble on

VIEWPOINT

JASON RUCKER

November is here, and we're all at the point of no return in our classes. Therefore, students all over campus are up to one thing — hard-core procrastination! Whether it's keeping up with the football team, and every other NCAA team, in an effort to understand the Bowl Championship Series, blowing hours playing video games or just sitting around saying, "Man, I have a lot of homework," we all spend too much time procrastinating the tasks at hand.

One positive thing can come out of this, though. While you're sitting around, a lot of thoughts will drop into your mind unannounced. They will ask how the wife and kids are, steal a beer out of your refrigerator, and then they're off down the stream of consciousness into the void of your mind again.

During such idle times, I've come up with a few ideas and theories.

Anyone out there looking for an idea for a massive research project should consider this one: I believe there is a fixed amount of common sense in the universe. Matter and energy can be neither created nor destroyed, only converted to other forms. Likewise, common sense is at a constant level. With the ever-increasing population on this planet, some individuals are getting severely low dosages of common sense. Like energy and matter, common sense is not equally distributed in the universe.

How else could you explain the increasing numbers of completely ignorant things that seem to be happening around the world? Just as black holes suck in all matter and energy in their vicinity, there are mental black holes that suck the common sense from the people around them, for example, Fred Phelps.

A local phenomenon that catches my attention seasonally is in regards to local motorists. It seems a direct correlation exists between ambient temperature and the average IQ of anyone behind the wheel of an automobile in Manhattan. As the temperature drops exceedingly lower, people grow less and less intelligent. Temperatures at or below freezing correlate to the absolute zero for motorist IQ.

When there's ice on the road, many people seem to think it would be the best time to consider speed limits as rough guidelines, rather than strict limits. Perhaps they think numbers posted on the signs indicate the number of near fatal collisions they should create per hour on the road. This could easily be evidence for the constant level of common sense theory and might suggest that common sense, like a molecule, is more active at elevated temperatures.

On the serious side, when roads are covered in snow or ice, DRIVE CAREFULLY! For those of you in need of a definition of the word "carefully" as used in this context, it means to drive slower than the speed limit if necessary to keep your vehicle in control. "Control" could be defined as fishtailing and the inability to stop within 20 feet while traveling at 30 mph. These signs indicate a lack of control. If you are out of control, here's one tip: Don't slam on the brakes! Apply them gently, and slow down.

Another topic that should be seriously considered is the responsibility our generation holds. People call us Generation X, while some call us the PC Generation. I have a serious agenda for us all — the death of the comb-over!

Hopefully none of us has gotten to the point in our gradual shedding where we have considered this abomination. Many of you out there may be on your way to a point where you will be forced to choose. If you are experiencing depilatory stress to your scalp, I feel your pain. At only 22, if I spend too much time in the sun, the top of my head looks like the business end of a baboon.

But gentlemen, the comb-over is not the answer, no more than a six-pack of Jolt cola and a kilo of Pixie Sticks is the answer when your kids are riled up and you can't get them to go to bed. The comb-over doesn't hide your protruding cranium, it only serves to accent your balding and the fact that you're self-conscious. If you're hair is parted less than one inch above your ear, you have a problem. Admit it, and seek help. Instead of being part of the problem, let's be part of the solution! Friends don't let friends comb-over.

Just a few thoughts and theories to ponder.

2 new eateries welcome surprises in restaurant scene

VIEWPOINT

RUSSELL FORTMEYER

Eating out in Manhattan has been the best argument for going to bed orphan-style since the invention of Vienna sausages.

Dear friends, if you didn't see this coming, shame, dear ones, shame. Yes, it's time for my annual, glittering review of local dining options. And much to the benefit of those pathetic establishments that pretend they are something more than bland bars serving "food," this is, sadly, my last restaurant roundup. So, break out the knives and forks, kiddies, because this gastronome has a bad case of indigestion.

Unless one submits to dining week after week at the few good restaurants we have, the expectations for a pleasant and memorable meal experience are as high as Newt Gingrich's approval ratings.

That, fortunately, has changed considerably this fall with the addition of two extraordinarily different restaurants to our city — Mount Everest and the just-opened-this-weekend Coco Bolos. With few exceptions, these two restaurants are serious about food, both offering culinary experiences that otherwise don't exist in this city.

Ok, we'll skip over the jokes-on-you style food-serving places such as Applebee's Grill & Bar, Carlos O'Kelly's Mexican Cafe, Chili's Bar & Grill, Amarillo Mesquite Grill, Lucky BrewGrille and the list goes on. Let's consider our two new options.

Mount Everest, an Indian restaurant in the Days Inn on Tuttle Creek Boulevard, is a delightful surprise. Offering an alternating buffet of curry dishes, numerous vegetarian options, delicious roasted red chicken and simple, yet good desserts such as rice pudding, this is the place to go with a big group looking for some exotic fun.

Rarely does Manhattan afford an opportunity to sample so many different foods. Even if spicy food scares you away, the chefs at Mount Everest keep their dishes on the lighter side. Besides, with so many options, it's easy to steer clear of tear-inducing dishes.

Not only would I urge you to go just to support a chef with something more on his mind than burgers and fries, it's truthfully a wonderfully non-Manhattan experience. Hey, if I'm not a good enough sell for you, consider that Mount Everest catered last Sunday's annual India cultural night. If this place is good enough for our local Indian population, need I say more?

You might be turned off somewhat by the mild motel lobby decor at the Days. But think of yourself in an American tourist-class hotel in New Delhi, and the evening instantly takes on an atmosphere of retro-1950s kitsch. Just go, enjoy the food, and you'll thank me.

Our second serious addition is Aggieville's Coco Bolos, a New Mexican-esque cantina by the same chefs who brought us stalwarts Texas Star Cafe and The Hibachi Hut. Personally, those two incomparable restaurants could use a little menu change to update some tired dishes. However, this columnist has been known to dine weekly at Texas Star (the Black Bean Burrito being a favorite).

Coco Bolos, which sneaked open on Friday, is again another surprise and wholly welcome. Bolos is in the old Cinderella Dry Cleaners &

Laundry building next to New York Bagel Shop (yes, there will be a wait). Although I hardly would rate the restaurant from dining there on opening night, the results of the kitchen were the sorts of things that make you ooh and aah.

For example, my friend and I started out with a deliciously light queso that is unlike any other in town. Or you could try a soup, although we did not. Main courses are few but go for the giant Cox Brother's Burrito. Dessert includes a bread pudding with raisins, toasted almonds and a perfect caramel sauce. All of this is prepared in an open kitchen that fills the tiny, colorful restaurant with wonderful smells.

Bolos goes much further in setting a mood than does Mount Everest, especially with artist Angeli Meyer's stunning mural over the bar that unifies the space. But if you're looking for food in this town, that's a minor bone to pick.

We could round out the review by talking up the well-deserved reputations of Harry's Uptown Supper Club, Marco Polo Ristorante or Little Apple Brewing Co. Or we could trash a few more perennial targets such as 12th Street Pub.

Instead, why don't you put down the paper, make friends with your stomach and arrange dinner plans this weekend at one of our two new finds. After eating out so much in this town with mixed results, you owe that stomach big time.

Distance learning offers alternative opportunities

■ Courses popular with nontraditional students, fit into busy schedules

By SHANDA PARKER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's time to enroll for next semester. Most students must decide which classes to take, at what times and with what instructor. However, several students are deciding whether they want to learn by video, audiotape or even the World Wide Web.

The Division of Continuing Education offers more than 100 distance education courses. These courses are offered not only for students away from campus but also for students on campus.

"Distance learning has become very popular," David Stewart, assistant dean of continuing education, said. "KSU has been doing it for many years. It's not new, but the new ways of delivery are."

This semester 60 classes are offered and 600 students are enrolled in them. The most popular course this fall, with 60 students enrolled, has been a statistics course offered on videotape.

Stewart said classes continue to grow in size and the number offered. He said the courses are very attractive to nontraditional students looking for a career change or wanting to develop a new career.

All the courses offered by K-State have an instructor on campus. The instructors are available at any time if students have questions.

Bob Burton, associate professor of agricultural economics, teaches Farm and Ranch Management by audiotape and videotape. Burton said he communicates with his students through e-mail, sends a newsletter, and generally calls them 2 to 3 times during the semester to make sure students are not having any problems.

"The key thing in distance learning is maintaining communication," Burton said.

Stewart said the courses offer a lot to the students. He said students are usually satisfied with the class setting, format of the classes and working with the instructors.

Stewart said it is not only the students who enjoy the classes but also the instructors.

"Instructors have enjoyed the challenge of teaching their courses from a distance," Stewart said.

Burton said he has enjoyed teaching the classes and has benefited from them. He said it is interesting to have such a wide range of students from different locations and of different ages. He has found that several students taking his Farm and Ranch Management course are midcareer farmers who are eager to learn.

Courses are offered for any student on campus.

Linda Henderson, program coordinator for the continuing education division, said these courses can fit well into students' schedules. She said students who are having problems with scheduling classes should look to see if the class is offered through distance learning. She said this avoids schedule conflicts and lets students take the courses they need. Henderson said the program has been successful, but the students need to work hard.

"They do have to be dedicated and have discipline," she said.

Tutoring helps students make the grade

By JAMI STUMP
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Several locations on campus offer sessions in variety of subjects

Students struggling to make it through a class can receive free tutoring or assistance from different campus sources.

Tutoring is available through the Derby Academic Resource Center, programs through Leasure and Holton halls and scheduled workroom times by several departments on campus.

The Derby Academic Resource Center offers tutoring for students in biology, calculus I and II, macroeconomics, physics I and II, chemistry I and II, general chemistry, college and intermediate algebra and all Spanish classes.

Shana Meyer, coordinator of academic affairs for the Department of Housing and Dining Services, said the tutoring sessions take place on both sides of campus at Derby, Marlatt and Goodnow residence halls.

"We get qualified people who have all received an A or a B in the class, and we also receive recommendations from the instructors of the class," Meyer said.

Meyer said tutors are paid through the Academic Assistance Center. Joyce Christensen, graduate student in psychology and office staff at Leasure, said the tutoring through their office is all paid for by student privilege fees. Tutors are paid minimum wage or more, depending on the number of students being tutored.

Tutoring available through Holton and Leasure is based on students' needs. Those interested in being tutored fill out an application. However, the programs no longer are taking students for this semester.

Depending on the number of students who need tutoring for a specific class and the students' needs, they receive group tutoring at Leasure or one-on-one assistance at Holton, Christensen said.

"Students are surprised when they come in, and it is group tutoring here at Leasure," Christensen said. "Students receiving tutoring need to come in with questions and be up to date on their assignments. The tutors are there to help several people, not just the person that is falling behind."

Tutoring sessions last for 50 minutes at the same time every week. Christensen said students must follow an attendance policy with only five excused absences and two unexcused absences.

The Department of Physics is one department scheduling workroom times for students. Three upper-level undergraduate students or lab professors are available to assist students with their assignments from 4:30 to 6:30 p.m. Monday through Wednesday in Cardwell 143.

The physics department decided to start a workroom after seeing the benefits students received from a similar workroom situation the Department of Math offers.

The workroom is available to assist students taking the classes Physical World I through Engineering Physics II.

Charles "Lew" Cocke, professor of physics, said the workroom is designed to give students the necessary support when working on physics assignments.

"Students can come and work on assigned problems and use undergraduate students as a resource," Cocke said.

Todd Dobberstein, junior in electrical engineering and pre-medicine, has been an undergraduate workroom assistant the past two semesters.

He said the workroom has been open to students for the past two semesters and use has been increasing.

"The students really like it and have found that it really helps them a lot," Dobberstein said. "From the numbers that keep coming and their reactions, the help rooms have been getting a very positive response."

Dobberstein said he tries to get students to find the answer on their own.

"The biggest thing is to try to make them think and not to do the problem for them because that is not really beneficial to them," Dobberstein said. "I ask them questions and get them involved in the problem."

"Hopefully this will help them reach a solution."

Martin returns to Show-Me State, hopes to come back with bragging rights

■ Senior lineman recruited by Tigers in high school.

By JOHN BERGGREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There's one team offensive lineman Jeremy Martin looks forward to playing more than any other opponent each season, and surprisingly, it's not Nebraska.

Martin, a Liberty, Mo., native, looks forward to playing his home-state Tigers each season, and as a fifth-year senior there are special things on the line when the Wildcats travel to Columbia, Mo., this weekend.

"I really enjoy this game, and I have a lot of fun," Martin said. "It's definitely a pride thing for me when I go home to beat Missouri."

"The Kansas City area is such a melting pot for all the guys who go to MU and all the guys who go to K-State. If you're from K-State, you want to win all your games against them, because there's bragging rights involved."

During the past few years the K-State vs. Missouri football rivalry has heightened as both programs have improved vastly. The Wildcats enter the game 10-0 overall and 7-0 in the Big 12 Conference and already have wrapped up first place in the North division. Sitting closely behind is second-place Missouri, 7-3 on the season and 5-2 in the conference.

Even though the Wildcats have earned the automatic berth to the Big 12 Championship, Missouri players have said they've been looking forward to this matchup all season.

"I just think in the past few years it's been Missouri and us fighting for second place, and everybody knew that," Martin said. "I think they're just upset that we've come out on top, and they think this is their year, so we'll see what happens this weekend."

"They have it out for us, and they want to beat the tar out of us. They've made that evident all week, and that just makes it more of a challenge for us."

Martin was recruited by Missouri out of high school, but he took his first and only college visit at K-State and never looked back.

"At that time, I just felt like Kansas State gave me the best opportunity," Martin said.

"I took one visit, and that was here, and I knew after that visit that this is where I wanted to play."

Though Missouri was struggling at the time when Martin was being recruited, Larry Smith took over as head coach for the Tigers and since has implemented a Bill Snyder-like turnaround. Only one coach in Missouri history has a better record in his fifth season at the Tiger helm. Don Faurot led his team to an 8-2 record in 1939. Martin said he was not surprised at the job Smith has done since taking over the Missouri program.

"In a lot of ways he's like Coach Snyder," Martin said. "He practices his guys hard, and he expects a lot out of them, and when you do that with a Big 12 football team, you're going to get better."

"They've always had good talent and good players, and it was just a matter of putting everything together. I think this year, obviously, they've put it together really well."

November has unusual feel for Huskers

■ Loss to K-State gives Nebraska 3rd loss of year.

By TIM KORTE
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LINCOLN, Neb. — For five exuberant years, a Nebraska victory was just another part of an autumn weekend in the Cornhusker State, like raking leaves or going to church.

This fall, it's different. Nebraska is learning to deal with failure.

A 40-30 loss at K-State on Saturday gave the Huskers three conference defeats for the first time since 1976.

"We lost to a good team last weekend, but we feel we should have beaten them," defensive end Chad Kelsay said. "That's the hard part: knowing we could have beaten the teams we lost to."

He pointed out that none of the games Nebraska lost was decided until the closing minutes, but it's important to remember a few of the victories went down to the wire, too.

The Huskers (8-3, 4-3 in the Big 12) escaped with a goal-line stand as time expired to beat Oklahoma State 24-17, and Missouri missed a tying touchdown when an open receiver dropped a pass in the end zone with four seconds left.

From 1993-97, Nebraska went 60-3 and won two national titles while sharing a third last year with Michigan. The success gave Nebraska an aura of invincibility.

That's why this season's losses to Texas A&M, Texas and K-State have been so hard to take. The Huskers have had to give up hope for any kind of championship.

"All we're doing now is playing for pride," center Josh Heskew said.

Nebraska has an open date this weekend before ending the regular season Nov. 27 against Colorado (7-3, 4-3). The Huskers insist they're still a great team, despite what three different scoreboards have indicated.

"I take nothing from their win. They're a good team," tight end Sheldon Jackson said after the K-State loss.

"But I believe the best team in the country has three losses this season, and it wears 'N' on its helmets."

Heskew and Kelsay said they agreed the best way to prove the Huskers are still for real is by beating Colorado and finishing with a bowl-game victory.

"It's been a rough road this year — plenty of ups and downs," Heskew said. "When things have gone this bad, you set your mind on the things you still want to get done, what you want to accomplish to salvage the season."

It was a quiet trip back from Manhattan, Heskew said. Yet by Monday, he said all the Huskers were committed to regrouping, despite having to build off a loss for the third time this fall.

"We came to peace with ourselves," he said. "I think everyone is pretty eager to get back on the field and play. The character of this team is not to lay down and quit. We haven't done that all year."

GETTING DEFENSIVE

Nebraska quarterback Eric Crouch (7) tries to escape the grasp of K-State defensive backs Dymond Carter (35) and Lamar Chapman (1) on a 16-yard run during the second half of Saturday's matchup against Nebraska. K-State won 40-30.

■ Defense prepares for Mizzou rushing attack.

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State defense has proved every week it is among the nation's best this season. It leads the nation in scoring defense through 10 games, allowing only 99 points on the season and a staggering 9.9 points per game.

As simple as it sounds, the key to not giving up many points is not giving up yardage, which the Wildcats have accomplished, ranking fifth in rush defense and third in pass defense nationally. K-State also stands at second place in the nation in total defense.

This week in Columbia, Mo., the Wildcats will have to contain two potent offensive threats in Tiger running back Devin West and versatile quarterback Corby Jones. West is third in the nation in rushing, with 1,402 yards and 18 touchdowns.

"Devin West is a very good back, and I think Jones will be the best quarterback we've faced this season," senior defensive end Joe Bob Clements said. "He's a lot like the Michael Bishop kind of quarterback.

He can pass the ball well but also can pull the ball down and run."

Earlier this season, Ricky Williams of Texas entered Manhattan as the nation's leading rusher, but he experienced his worst game of the season when he had just 43 yards on 25 carries. Since then, Williams has continued to shine and remains the Heisman Trophy favorite.

The difference between Texas' attack with Williams and Missouri's attack is the Tigers have a double threat to run the ball. Senior line-backer Mark Simoneau said that while the Cats knew Williams was going to get the ball, Missouri keeps opponents off balance with multiple rushing threats.

"We knew he (Williams) was going to get the ball 30 to 40 times," Simoneau said.

"I think they (West and Jones) work together. They're less predictable. You really start to get a feel for it as the game goes on."

"It's going to be a challenge for us," Clements said.

"When we played Williams we knew he would be the guy with the ball. We're not sure who is getting the ball in Missouri. It could be Jones or West."

"We've played great all year, and that comes from hard work and good preparation. We just need to keep on doing what we've done all year, and I think it'll work out for us."

Cornerback Adrian Beard said what the members of K-State's secondary do is simple, because they try to follow through with their responsibilities and play consistent.

"A lot of guys say we put seven guys in the box, but really, we just follow our responsibilities and get the job done," Beard said. "Against Missouri, we'll just play like we've always played and not do anything special. If we do that, we'll be just fine."

From the BCS to the Kansas State Jayhawks and Dr. Asbury, nothing makes much sense anymore

VIEWPOINT

Jon BALMER

Contrary to popular belief, it actually would have been more beneficial to K-State to lose to Nebraska on Saturday. You see, in the newly high-tech world of the Bowl Championship Series rankings, a loss would have increased the Huskers' strength of schedule, thereby setting off a chain reaction that would force the Magic Eight Ball to reply "All signs point to yes," when the sports guru at the Seattle Times asks, "Is K-State better than UCLA?"

With that, you understand the BCS. Your training as a sports Jedi master is complete.

■ Was the entire ABC sports team guilty of hitting the sauce a little too hard Saturday afternoon? From broadcaster Keith Jackson's (whom I still idolize) repeated offense of labeling us "the Kansas State Jayhawks" to the prehistoric camera work on the most important touchdown of the game (The operator was still fixed on Michael Bishop by the time Darnell McDonald finished celebrating.),

K-State's big-time appearance quickly dissipated in a sea of misidentified mascots and shoddy camera work.

Jackson didn't even say "Whoa, Nellie."

■ With the Biggest Game in School History, Part II, set to unfold in Columbia, Mo., this weekend, it's time to stress the need for a road trip. Sure, your bank account still might be recovering from the countless dollars forked over for a "Better Dead Than Red" T-shirt and some Purple Passion Power Shots, but if ever there was a time to pursue the Cats, this is it.

No one needs to be reminded about the importance of this game, and with Tigertown merely four hours away, a chance to see a regular season of perfection come to a close is worth it. Besides, Columbia offers many aesthetically pleasing things to keep you busy.

If you're going down Friday night, check out The Blue Note, a bar/music venue that represents everything Manhattan lacks in a music scene. While Asbury unleashed the intestine fairy on Ayome "Paco" May over the weekend, putting him back on the team and back in action Monday night. The way things are going, former player and humanitarian-of-the-year candidate Pero Vasiljevic might be arriving on a boat from Australia any day now.

The Little Apple seems bent on cornering every KISS tribute band in America. The Blue Note offers a nice mix of regional and national acts throughout the week.

But, this isn't about catching up on music. If you're looking for that, remember the immortal words of street poet Wesley Willis: "McDonald's is the place to rock."

This Saturday offers another opportunity to infiltrate enemy territory with a barrage of purple. We've done it at Colorado, we've done it at KU. Heck, even Waco, Texas, was overwhelmed by Cat backers, and that's twice as far away as Mizzou. This Saturday, Faurot Field needs to experience a purple makeover.

■ Is Tom Asbury auditioning for a career as a faith healer? Only two games into the season and the men's basketball head coach has brought Chris Griffin back from a knee injury that was supposed to halt him for two weeks. Not to be outdone, Asbury unleashed the intestine fairy on Ayome "Paco" May over the weekend, putting him back on the team and back in action Monday night. The way things are going, former player and humanitarian-of-the-year candidate Pero Vasiljevic might be arriving on a boat from Australia any day now.

■ Congratulations of the week go to former Royal Jose Offerman, who walked away with $26 million over the next four years Friday after the Mo Vaughn-less Boston Red Sox decided they had money to burn. While Offerman did check out with a .315 batting average and 45 stolen bases last season, saying you're the top performer for Kansas City isn't much. If the Red Sox had done their homework, they would realize that $6.5 million a year isn't exactly a steal for a player like Offerman. Besides, the Royals barely can afford to pay him more than $2 million per season anyway.

■ Saving the best for last, I'm proud to say the Chicago Blackhawks have dumped Swiss-cheese netminder Jeff "Don't call me Paul" Hackett in a trade with Montreal for quality keeper Jocelyn Thibault. I report this only to satisfy the demands of hockey-craving Collegian readers and not for any personal interest with the club.

Enjoy the upcoming turkey day, and remember, it's not Thanksgiving without a good game of backyard football.

Brian Agler accepts deal from WNBA

Former K-State women's basketball coach to leave ABL in May

By TIM PUET

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

COLUMBUS, Ohio — The coach of the American Basketball League's top team said Tuesday that an offer from the Women's National Basketball Association was too good to turn down.

"This was cut-and-dried, strictly a financial decision," Brian Agler, a former K-State women's coach, said of his plans to leave the Columbus Quest at the end of the ABL season in May.

He will become coach and general manager of Minnesota's expansion team in the WNBA, which starts training camp in May.

"I made the decision because I wanted to provide security for my family and because Minnesota offered a guaranteed contract, and that's the extent of it," he said.

Agler said the contract with Minnesota is for three years and includes a three-year mutual option after the 2001 season. He did not provide specific amounts, but said his salary would be "above six figures with annual increases. That's about 35 to 40 percent more than I'm making now."

Agler has an 81-21 record with the Quest, which has won back-to-back ABL titles in the two seasons of the league's existence.

He has been looking for a WNBA job since September, when the ABL asked him to step down as the team's general manager and limit his duties to coaching.

"The league wanted to change the franchise structure and asked me to take a 37-percent pay cut," he said. "I said I'd do it, but only if I could get a release allowing me to coach elsewhere after this season ends and buying out my contract."

After the league agreed to his request, he interviewed with the WNBA teams in Washington and New York before taking the Minnesota offer.

Agler's switch is the latest of several defections from the ABL to the WNBA, which for the most part is in larger cities and arenas, has the financial and marketing support of NBA teams and plays its games in the summer, when there's no significant basketball competition.

Nikki McCray left the Quest to join the WNBA after being chosen as the ABL's Most Valuable Player in its first season. Dawn Staley, considered the top point guard in the women's game, made the switch this summer after two seasons in the ABL.

Agler said that despite the defections, he feels the two leagues can coexist.

"My feeling is this is not such a big deal," he said of his decision to switch. "The sport is a lot bigger than something like this. Both leagues are doing well and can sustain the loss of players and coaches."

When questioned about the possibility of the leagues merging, Agler said, "I think I'm the wrong person to ask about that. I don't know if the two are even in conversation."

Agler had kept his players informed of his plans and told them about his decision to leave after a victory Sunday over the Chicago Condors.

"It was a very difficult thing to do because we as a team have developed so much unity and chemistry that it's truly like a family," he said. "But we also know that everybody has his or her own agenda, and everybody respects that. They understand my situation, especially since I've kept them abreast of it from the beginning."

The Quest is unbeaten after its first four games despite losing starters Valerie Still and Katie Smith to knee injuries.

"We've lost some players but managed to stay afloat," Agler said. "Just because we lost a few people, we still have high goals and expectations, and my focus for now is to leave Columbus with a third championship."

Simmons waived, Thomas suspended for actions

By DOUG TUCKER

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Pro Bowl defensive end Derrick Thomas was suspended for one game Tuesday and line-backer Wayne Simmons was waived, a day after Kansas City Chiefs owner Lamar Hunt said their actions "disgraced this organization as well as the community."

Thomas, Simmons and defensive end Chester McGlockton drew a total of five personal foul penalties in a shocking breakdown of self control Monday night in the final minutes of Denver's 30-7 victory.

Thomas, who has been to the Pro Bowl each of his nine seasons, was flagged once for hitting quarterback Bubba Brister in the head when he was on the ground and twice for pulling and twisting Denver tight end Shannon Sharpe's face mask.

The fouls all came in Denver's final touchdown drive and left fans and coaches alike fuming.

Coach Marty Schottenheimer met with reporters earlier Tuesday and promised, "this will not be tolerated."

Simmons refused to speak with reporters when he left Schottenheimer's office Tuesday afternoon. But Thomas had a news conference in which he accepted his punishment and apologized to practically everyone, including his mother, grandmother, teammates, coaches, Sharpe and "the youth of America."

"My conduct last evening was not characteristic of my game," he said. Although he signed a five-year, $27 million contract extension before last season, Thomas' role this year has been reduced to pass-rushing duties because he is so ineffective against the run.

"I allowed a situation to get out of hand. For that, I apologize to my teammates who were on the field with me. I jeopardized our ability to win a football game," Thomas said. "I sincerely apologize and say to them my actions of last evening will never occur again."

"I have to take this week and evaluate Derrick Thomas and come back and be the best that I can be for my team and for my teammates."

Many wondered why Thomas was not ejected after his second face mask infraction in a matter of minutes against Sharpe. Schottenheimer admitted he should have pulled Thomas off the field.

"To Shannon, who I've known for a long, long time, and we've had our ins and outs and run-ins, I apologize to him because those type of actions shouldn't occur in a football game," Thomas said. "To the youth of America that look up to Derrick Thomas, I apologize to you because that is not sportsmanlike conduct, and you should not conduct yourself that way on the field."

Thomas said several things led up to the breakdown in discipline, including some that go back several years in the twice-a-year battles between the two AFC West rivals.

"I let someone influence me into doing something that was totally out of character," he said.

The bizarre incident was just the latest in a series of setbacks for the Chiefs (4-6), who have lost five in a row for the first time since 1988 and have fallen out of playoff contention in a season in which they were expected them to contend for the Super Bowl.

"I've looked at the video, and I say once again, I'm embarrassed, humiliated. I'm angry," Schottenheimer said. "I'm really disappointed that at the end of the football game some individuals decided what's best for this football team isn't important to them — that their own personal agenda is what they're interested in."

Thomas' suspension means he cannot take part in practices or meetings and will miss the Chiefs' game Sunday in San Diego. Simmons, who signed a three-year contract last year, had not been playing well and probably would have been waived at the end of the year anyway.

The league still could hand out punishment of its own on Thomas, who said the Chiefs' decision was fair.

"I think the punishment is justifiable. There are certain things you can and can't do within the framework or the confines of the game," he said. "My actions last night were uncharacteristic and in some senses uncalled for."

Number of college smokers jumps 28 percent in 4 years

By LAURAN NEERGAARD
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Cigarette smoking is on the rise among college students, jumping 28 percent in four years, causing health advocates to warn the nation it might face more tobacco-caused diseases.

"The rise in this group is really an alarming sign," said Henry Wechsler of Harvard University, whose study appears in today's Journal of the American Medical Association.

Wechsler's findings aren't a surprise — smoking already had risen among teenagers by 32 percent in the 1990s.

So once those teens hit college, the rates among college students were sure to rise, too.

But the findings show health officials must target college students to try to get them to quit, said Dr. Donald Sharp of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Some 3,000 teen-agers begin smoking every day. The question is what was happening to people a little older — the 18- to 24-year-olds now in college.

Wechsler compared surveys of more than 14,000 students at 116 colleges in 1993 and again in 1997. Some 28.5 percent of college students smoked last year, up from 22.3 percent in 1993, he reported.

The vast majority started smoking in high school — only 11 percent of college students had their first cigarette after age 18. But 28 percent moved from occasionally trying cigarettes in high school to becoming regular smokers in college, a finding the CDC called worrisome.

Half of college smokers reported they had tried to quit in the previous year, and 18 percent had made five or more attempts at kicking the addiction.

The findings stress the need for colleges to offer more smoke-free dormitories because students might go without that cigarette if they can't smoke it conveniently, Wechsler said.

Interest rates cut for 3rd time in 7 weeks

■ Federal Reserve warns not to expect more rate cuts anytime soon.

By DAVE SKIDMORE
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Federal Reserve moved to protect the economy Tuesday by cutting interest rates for the third time in seven weeks but signaled to Wall Street not to expect any more reductions soon.

After meeting privately, Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan and his colleagues announced they had cut two benchmark interest rates, each by a quarter percentage point. The rate charged among banks on overnight loans fell to 4.75 percent, and the rate on the Fed's own loans fell to 4.5 percent.

Major banks responded by cutting their prime lending rates to 7.75 percent. That will translate into cheaper monthly payments on a variety of consumer and business loans, including credit-card balances and auto loans.

first, but then read the fine print. The Dow Jones industrial average shot up 75 points from Monday's close but then finished down 25 points at 8,986.

In its statement, the Fed said, with the latest cut, "financial conditions can reasonably be expected to be consistent with fostering sustained economic expansion while keeping inflationary pressures subdued."

Economists say that virtually rules out another rate cut at the Fed's next scheduled meeting on Dec. 22, unless there are unforeseen deteriorations in the economy or financial markets. The next chance would come after policy-makers meet in early February.

"I would think the Federal Reserve would be more prudent now and wait and see how the economy develops in the United States and other countries," said economist Norman Robertson of Smithfield Trust Co. in Pittsburgh. "But I think the Fed exercised good judgment today, providing some degree of insurance against a more severe economic decline in the coming year."

Wall Street traders had been anticipating Tuesday's cut but with considerably less certainty than just a month ago, before the stock market's strong rebound. The Dow went above 9,000 on Monday for the first time since July.

The Fed acknowledged "financial markets have settled down materially since mid-October" but said "unusual strains remain."

In a way, the market's earlier anticipation of a cut acted as a self-fulfilling prophecy, analysts said.

"They kind of got co-opted," said economist Martin Regalia of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "If Greenspan and company had not gone along with this cut, there would have been a very nasty reaction in financial markets."

Tuesday's cut brought the federal funds rate to its lowest level in four years.

It was the third cut since Sept. 29, when the Fed cut rates for the first time in three years.

That first cut failed to calm Wall Street, and banks began pulling back from business lending. In a surprise move, the Fed cut rates again Oct. 15. That proved far more effective.

Two factors argued in support of the third cut: the tameness of inflation — too many rate cuts could stimulate inflation pressures — and the nation's sharply increasing trade deficit.

The Labor Department said Tuesday that inflation rose a modest 0.2 percent in October.

For the first 10 months of the year, inflation is running at a mild 1.6 percent annual rate.

Meanwhile, economists are forecasting the trade deficit — $136 billion last year — will approach $250 billion this year and $300 billion next year.

That's forcing factories to lay off workers.

Since March, their payrolls are down by 200,000 jobs, and the nation's unemployment rate has crept up to 4.6 percent from a 28-year low of 4.3 percent in the spring.

So far, strong consumer spending has kept the U.S. economy going at a fairly brisk rate, but Americans have been saving next to nothing to sustain that pace. Economic growth will lapse from about 3.6 percent this year to 2.1 percent next year, economists predict. Most said they thought the economy will avoid a recession.

Sculptor to share work, job hunting advice

BY KELLY LYNN

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A sculptor best known for his works that explore death is coming to K-State to share his work and give a little practical advice about life.

Michael Aurbach, sculptor and assistant professor of fine arts at Vanderbilt University, will lecture at 10:30 a.m. today at the United Missouri Bank Theater in the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

After his lecture, Aurbach will give a job hunting workshop at 4:30 p.m. in Willard 120.

"His work is well-crafted and very clever," Dan Hunt, assistant professor of art, said.

Aurbach is best known for his sculpture series, "Final Portraits," a series of large, three-dimensional boxes, or caskets, that represent various occupations and identities. Each work is a sculptural metaphor for issues such as death, prejudice and injustice that each occupation and identity faces.

"His work pays homage to people in various occupations," Hunt said.

Aurbach began "Final Portraits" in the mid-1980s. The series includes "American Indian," "Handicapped Person," "Mail Carrier," "Truck Driver," "Gay Person" and "Banker."

Aurbach has lectured at universities and organizations nationwide, and more than 100 magazine and newspaper articles have been written about his artwork. His sculptures have earned various awards, including a National Endowment for the Arts Visual Artists Fellowship Award from the National Museum of American Art Smithsonian Institution in 1996.

Aurbach has a master of fine arts degree in sculpture from Southern Methodist University in Dallas, a bachelor of fine arts degree in studio art, a master of arts degree in history of art, a bachelor of science degree in journalism and a bachelor of arts degree in biology from the University of Kansas.

His workshop will encourage art students in their search for jobs. He will give advice about where to look for jobs and reassure students that the job market is expanding for those in art-related fields.

U2 unleashes part 1 of greatest hits

By JEFF ELLIOTT

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With the release of "The Best of U2 1980-1990," the Irish megagroup charges back into the mainstream of rock music with a collection of songs from its first seven studio recordings.

The various songs on the album range from fan favorites such as "New Year's Day" and "Pride (In the Name of Love)" to more obscure songs such as the title track from the band's 1984 release, "The Unforgettable Fire."

Lyrical, the band has progressed consistently through the years.

From "A boy tries to be a man/his mother takes him by the hand/he starts to cry, oh why," the opening lines of 1980's "I Will Follow," to "My hands are tied/my body bruised/I got nothing to win/I got nothing left to lose," from 1987's heartfelt sentiment of "With or Without You," lead singer Bono and company have displayed brilliantly the continuous maturing process their music has gone through.

Musically, U2 is all over the place. Their style varies from the heavily Irish folk-influenced "Sunday Bloody Sunday" to "When Love Comes to Town," a duet with blues legend B.B. King.

U2 also adds a touch of religion with "I Still Haven't Found What I'm Looking For," which Bono describes as a gospel song.

Some things have remained constant for the quartet. The innovative guitar work and trademark riffs of lead guitarist The Edge not only influenced many young guitar players in the 1980s, but also has produced a sound that is distinctively U2.

Fans who bought the album within the first week of its release received the "B-sides" compact disc to accompany "The Best of U2 1980-1990."

Included on this collection are "Sweetest Thing," which has been released as a current single, and "Unchained Melody," a remix of the signature Riteous Brothers' song.

"Sweetest Thing," although recorded in 1998, originally was written and recorded during the making of "The Joshua Tree" in 1986. The song, currently premiering as a video on MTV, was written by Bono to his wife, Ali, as a way to relay his apologies for being on the road during her birthday.

B-side "Unchained Melody" has all the power and emotion of the original song, along with the addition of the signature guitar sound of The Edge.

Collectively, "The Best of U2 1980-1990" is a must for people who consider themselves true music fans.

The album is a definitive collection of a band that has stood the test of time and has managed to keep its music alive, despite the constant shifts in the volatile world of popular music.

Abstract art program to help understand representation

Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art highlights abstract art in public interactive workshop

By M.A. LOROFF

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

People can escape the illusion of reality and turn a green lollipop into a tree during a workshop at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

Kathrine Walker Schlageck, museum educator, will lead an interactive workshop, "Looking at Abstract Art," at 7 p.m. Thursday. The workshop is open to the public and free.

"The idea is to help people understand abstract art better, not necessarily make them like it," she said.

The lecture and workshop will look briefly at the history of abstract art, focus on the differences between objective and non-objective art, and include two art projects to help participants experience abstract art.

"The first art project will help people understand art as representation," Schlageck said. "The second project is non-objective and based on emotion."

Abstract art is what happens when artists get away from the illusion of reality and back to the basics of art using line, color, shape and texture.

Schlageck said the stick figures children draw when depicting people are good examples of abstract art.

"Most people find abstract art more difficult to understand than highly representational art," Schlageck said. "I think we expect art to look like something and have an easily understandable message."

The art museum is highlighting abstract art partly for the upcoming exhibition of work by Kansas native Alan Shields, which opens at the end of March. His work is abstract, utilizing mixed media, print-making on handmade paper and collage.

Schlageck said people will understand abstraction better after the workshop.

"You understand better by doing," she said. "The workshop will be fun for people of all ages, and you don't have to be an artist to do it."

TAPES

Maryland grand jury is considering whether she broke state wiretapping law by taping Lewinsky without her knowledge.

At times, Tripp comes across as a co-conspirator to Lewinsky, chortling at her schemes to rendezvous with Clinton. At other points, she is the school marm, correcting Lewinsky's grammar and voicing exasperation at her naivete.

"Oh, Monica, Monica, Monica," she sighs.

The irony of some lines rings through on the tapes. Even as Tripp is secretly taping her young friend, she advises Lewinsky, "I'd be careful what I said on the phone."

The presidential plotline plays out against the backdrop of ordinary life: A baseball game drones on television; Tripp's dog, Cleo, is shoed away any number of times; Tripp snaps her chewing gum.

The sighs, giggles and garbled syntax of informal conversation are heard. So is the angst of young love, as Lewinsky's moods veer from infatuation to anger, sweetness to cynicism.

Playfully trying to coax Clinton into letting her visit, Lewinsky mimics a New York "coffee talk" voice from "Saturday Night Live" in a recording that she makes for the president. With exaggerated accent, she tells him, "So I hope to see you later, and we can tawk about Corky and dogs."

At one point, frustrations boil over. Choking out words over sobs, she declares in a shaky voice, "I am hysterical. I am throwing things. I am shaking. My heart was hurting before. I just can't do this anymore."

In another conversation, Lewinsky's voice drops as she tells Tripp how the president hurt her when he said he wouldn't have gotten involved with her if he had known what kind of person she was. In almost a whisper, she says, "I'm going to make him take that back."

An instant later, both women break out in laughter as Lewinsky jokes, "(Expletive) him and the little motorcade he rode in on."

UNIX

"At the time, the e-mail's environment was working OK," he said.

Townsend also said Internet use has grown more rapidly than anyone expected, especially with more courses being put on the Internet.

"Basically, no one knew how hard we were getting hit," he said.

In April 1997, K-State's home page had about 80,000 hits a day. By April 1998, it had increased to 300,000. In the past six months, the hits to K-State's home page have doubled to nearly 600,000 per day, Townsend said.

The Internet now is equipped to handle the number of hits it is receiving per day, and with the unanticipated growth of the Unix system, plans have been made to upgrade the system permanently in December. Funding has been allotted through Beth Unger, vice provost of academic services, and new hardware has been ordered.

Unix system manager Jeff Pihl said even more Unix enhancements might be made by next summer.

"We're looking at making additions next summer," he said. "That is a goal that we have."

The further enhancement would include more processing power and an overall more substantial computer. The installations would protect the Unix system from crashing with a back-up system, Pihl said.

As for the crashing of the Unix system on Monday morning, it had to do with the file system and did not involve the new temporary enhancements.

"It was different, but interrelated," Townsend said.

Jeff Cooper/KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

More than 91 percent of K-State students, faculty and staff owns a vehicle. They are constantly looking for convenience and good service when buying accessories, and when it comes to maintenance and repair.

Seventy-nine percent of the K-State population spent more than $100 last year on vehicle purchases, repair or maintenance. And many more are searching for a new mode of transportation. More than 26 percent of those surveyed said they would be purchasing a vehicle within the next six months.

The Kansas State Collegian's readership of 30,000 represents many consumers for your business. The Collegian offers a special automotive directory providing students with a place to look for auto repair and sale information. Jump start your business by advertising your goods and services in the Collegian.

COMMISSION

Dan Colantone, president of the chamber, said the chamber's success over the past year in attracting new businesses like Sykes Enterprises Inc. and helping existing commerce expand demonstrates how Manhattan benefits from Chamber of Commerce services.

Although all of the commissioners praised the chamber for its efforts, primary concerns included the lack of available funds since the defeat of the proposed economic-development tax.

"I think we need to understand by not having that money, we shift some of our emphasis to you. You'll be our first line of defense to keep that program running," Commissioner Ed Klimek said.

Also mentioned was the chamber's reclusive nature to some citizens.

"There's sort of a boxing of the chamber as an entity. I think the chamber's going to have to do a lot of work to convince the people they're working in their best interest," Commissioner Roger Reitz said.

The commission's prime concern with the Fort Riley consultant, charged to represent the base's interests in Washington, D.C., was for greater consistency in status reports.

Another request of the night was from Mead Lumber Do-It-Center to be re-zoned from Planned Unit Development to C-5, Highway Service Commercial District.

Under the new designation proposal, already rejected by the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board, the store would be able to make changes to increase its viability, including a pole sign to stand out from competitors, store manager Nick Thilges said.

"Customers coming from the north are seeing them first, and they don't even know we exist," Thilges said.

If the changes were approved, the store could expand and add 10 to 12 employees, owner Bob Mead said. If not, the store could lose its franchise and have to eliminate up to 10 employees, he said.

The commission voted 4-1, with Reitz against, to send the proposal back to the board. If rejected again by the board, Mead could take the issue before the commission again for a final vote to settle the designation above the board's authority.

In other business, the commission unanimously approved first readings of ordinances re-zoning 27 acres from G-1, General Agricultural District, to PUD for an expansion by Meadowlark Hills Retirement Community as well as an annexation of 66 acres as part of the Miller Ranch Addition.

During the meeting, Mayor Steve Hall also accepted full responsibility for bypassing public comment on the meeting two weeks ago when the commission discussed movement of the Ten Commandments monolith from the north side of city hall.

Hall said he made the decision based on more than 1,000 pieces of correspondence on the issue in the 10 days before the meeting and tried to avoid arguments among citizens attending the meeting.

"Rightly or wrongly, I decided it was best to have that anger and frustration directed against me than citizen to citizen," Hall said.

Hall apologized to citizens and fellow commissioners, and he pledged to use more teamwork in future decisions.

The regents' staff prepared the report and plans to present it to the board during its regular monthly meeting Thursday. The nine-member board oversees the universities' operations.

"There is a concerted effort to reduce the attrition rate," Wilcox said.

At Fort Hays, 31 percent of the freshmen who enrolled for the first time in 1994 did not return a year later. The dropout rate for the 1995 class was 28.9 percent, but it increased to 31.6 percent for the 1996 class.

The increase came despite the university's efforts to retain freshmen. It requires freshmen to live on campus or in a fraternity or sorority.

Herb Songer, Fort Hays vice president of student affairs, said students who have not decided what degree they will pursue are particularly vulnerable. The university provides career counseling.

"Our undecided majors are our highest risk group," he said.

"We know that if we help them decide on a career, we'll have a better chance of retaining them."

The largest percentage decline in a freshman dropout rate was at Pittsburg State University. The rate was 32.8 percent for the 1994 freshman class and 29.5 percent two years later.

Pittsburg State has established telephone hot line for students who are having trouble academically or financially. It fields between 25 and 30 calls a day.

"The reasons people do leave are straightforward and understandable," said Bill McGuire, Pittsburg State's director of student support services.

"It's primarily because they feel they don't belong and they aren't good enough."

At the University of Kansas, the dropout rate declined from 24.4 percent for the 1994 freshman class to 22 percent for the 1996 class.

The rate at Wichita State University declined from 36.3 percent to 33.1 percent.

It declined from 31.2 percent to 29 percent at Emporia State University.

Consulting firm presents parking options at open forum

■ 7 options range from doing nothing to parking garages.

By SUZANNE WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students and faculty were able to check out possible parking options Wednesday during an open forum in McCain Auditorium.

The forum, sponsored by K-State Parking Services, displayed the options suggested by TranSystems Corporation, a consulting firm hired to assess the campus parking situation.

"TranSystems will be working until the end of the semester for a final recommendation," said Rita Newell, member of the K-State Steering Committee and assistant to the dean of Human Ecology.

Newell said the purpose of the forum and her committee is to get people on campus involved with the decision-making process for future change. She said that they want to know how students feel.

"We want to get them involved in the practice of finding the most feasible, practical and desirable decision," Newell said.

The first option that TranSystems proposed is to do nothing. K-State can leave the parking situation the way it is, and parking management would be the only adjustment made.

Tom Swenson, senior associate at TranSystems, said the biggest problem K-State will face if it chooses to do nothing about the parking situation is the population growth campus will experience within the next 10 years. He said the time it takes to search for a parking spot and the frustration people already feel when they try to find a parking spot will increase.

"If you think it's bad today, wait until five or 10 years from now," Swenson said.

Swenson also said the need to put more buildings on campus will hurt the parking situation even more. He said it is likely that one of those buildings will take place of a current parking lot.

"You're taking away supply and adding demand," Swenson said.

Another option is parking management. Swenson said parking services could use space-management techniques and parking

Cost estimates

Seven different options for solving K-State's parking problem were discussed at a forum on Wednesday. The estimated annual cost is based on the first 20 years of operation.

OPTION	ANNUAL COST
1. Do nothing	$0
2. Parking management	$150,000
3. Parking structure at Union	$1,377,375
4. Parking structure in north campus core	$1,651,469
5. Remote parking with shuttle bus service	$342,500
6. Remote parking with intra-campus shuttle	$582,500
7. Remote parking with campus/neighborhood shuttle	$982,500

GOP elects successor to Gingrich

By DAVID ESPO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Rep. Bob Livingston collected unanimous Republican backing Wednesday to become House speaker and quickly pledged action in the new Congress to cut taxes and preserve Social Security. J.C. Watts, the only black among 223 GOP lawmakers, won a leadership post, also.

"There are some who insist the Republican era is over," Livingston, R-La., told fellow GOP lawmakers still reeling from the loss of seats in this month's elections. "But that's like saying the American dream is over. It isn't true, and they know it."

He pledged cooperation with the Democrats, then added, "We will do so to advance Republican principles" of less government.

Livingston, 55, a pragmatic conservative and chairman of the Appropriations Committee with a history of working with Democrats, was nominated without opposition to succeed Newt Gingrich as speaker. Gingrich bade farewell to the Republicans whom he led to power four years ago, handed a gavel to Livingston to signal the shift in power, and then left Washington with his wife for a Florida vacation.

"Bob Livingston is totally in control right now," Rep. Gerald Solomon, R-N.Y., declared in the corridor outside the meeting room, even though Livingston's formal ascension won't occur until Congress convenes on Jan. 6.

Livingston's victory was sealed nearly two weeks ago when Gingrich stunned Republicans with a decision to step down. The Louisianan had already begun campaigning for votes, and he quickly cleared the field of opponents.

But there were lively races for other leadership posts as Republicans sought to retool for the congressional session over the next two years and the elections in 2000.

Majority Leader Dick Armey of Texas was re-elected, but needed three ballots before vanquishing Reps. Steve Largent of Oklahoma, Jennifer Dunn of Washington and J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, the chief deputy whip whose name was offered by other lawmakers in a draft effort. Armey's margin of victory was

K-State Livestock Judging Team wins 5th straight national title

Hell doesn't have to freeze over when you're the K-State Livestock Judging Team; it's been warm and sunny in November for the past five years.

The team has won the national championship, again.

Officials at the North American International Livestock Exposition in Louisville, Ky. — the Fiesta Bowl of livestock judging contests — announced on Tuesday that K-State has won livestock judging's most competitive contest for the fifth consecutive time.

This is the 15th time K-State has won the contest since its inception 95 years ago. No team has won it as many times consecutively, and only Iowa State University has won it more often.

"We got it done," said Bryan Kasselmann, first-place winner in individual competition and senior in animal sciences and industry. "It was very stressful in the end, because we didn't get our name called in sheep or hogs."

K-State didn't place in the top five in the first few categories, which made team members a little nervous.

"We were worried in the beginning," said Jamie Horrie, second place winner and senior in animal science. Horrie said that at that point, Coach Scott Schaake, assistant professor of animal science, basically said the team was out of the running.

However, K-State dominated the cattle and oral reasons categories, giving them just enough total points to defeat Texas A&M and Panhandle State University, which tied for second. The margin was only by 14 points.

"We had no idea we'd win," said Matt Wallace, senior in animal science.

Schaake said he attributed the team's success to the quality and depth of its membership.

"We don't have a bad one in the group," Schaake said. "It takes a total team effort, and these students are competitive anyway."

The 10 members that prepared for the national contest have been practicing since last December.

"It's worse than a full-time job," Kasselmann said. "You practice Monday,

K-State Marching Band's budget limits road trips to away games

By AMANDA LEVIN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At every home football game, the familiar sounds of the K-State Marching Band fill the stadium and lead the fans. But when the Wildcats leave Manhattan, the band usually does not follow.

Frank Tracz, K-State director of bands, said the band's tight budget and busy schedule keep the band from following the Wildcats to all out-of-town games.

The band's budget is $102,000, which comes from student fees and is used for equipment, repairs, a part-time secretary, copies and other expenses throughout the year. Any travel expenses to away games also would come from the band's budget.

The band has 305 members and would be willing to send a smaller pep band to each away game if the athletic department or another entity would pay for the travel expenses, Tracz said. Travel expenses would include transportation for members and all equipment, tickets for members to go to the game, lodging if applicable and spending money to feed the band members.

"We do travel to the University of Kansas game every other year because it is the big interstate rival game, it is close and we do not have to pay for individual band members' tickets — other schools we would have to," Tracz said.

Bands from other Big 12 Conference schools, like KU and the University of Texas, send smaller pep bands to accompany their football teams on away games.

"We have sent a pep band to all the conference games this year," said Robert Foster, director of the KU Marching Band. "The funds for travel expenses do not come from the band's budget. The athletic department pays for most of the expenses."

Bob Cavello, K-State assistant athletic director for business, said his department's budget is tight, but if it could find the funding, it would be willing to send a pep band to

Alleged hazing victim wants to see records

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Seven months after an alleged hazing connected with the K-State chapter of Kappa Alpha Psi fraternity, Ernest Harris Jr. is suing for access to records of the criminal investigation.

Harris, who graduated from K-State in fall 1997 with a degree in business administration, allegedly was hazed by fraternity members. No criminal charges were filed by Riley County Attorney Bill Kennedy.

Kennedy said that Harris wanted the records so he could have information that police discovered while investigating the alleged hazing.

Harris is not suing Kennedy but is suing for access to the records, because criminal-investigation records aren't released to the public. A court has to order them released, Kennedy said.

"Essentially, as I understand it, he would have to demonstrate to the court the importance of those papers to him beats the policy of privacy of police reports," Kennedy said.

Kennedy said the court often releases these records.

On April 17, Harris allegedly was beaten with a paddle and had to be taken to the intensive-care unit at the University of Kansas Medical Center, where he was listed in serious condition. He later was released and lives in Olathe, Kan.

Although a university investigation suggested that only one of four members of Kappa Alpha Psi were present at the time of the beating, the K-State chapter of the fraternity was suspended from campus.

Oil pipeline leak spills oil into Verdigris river

COFFEYVILLE, Kan. — A leak in a southeast Kansas oil pipeline sent about 33,000 gallons of crude oil and naphtha into a river and flowed about 13 miles downstream into Oklahoma before being discovered.

Officials of the Farmland Refinery in Coffeyville said Wednesday that they were working to contain the spill on the Verdigris River but that some of the oily mixture continues to travel downstream.

The leak in the pipeline was discovered after the Montgomery County sheriff's department received calls around 8 p.m. Tuesday of a strong petroleum odor just east of Coffeyville, Sheriff Jack Daniels said.

No injuries or evacuations were reported, Daniels said.

Farmland officials said Wednesday afternoon that while the exact cause of the leak was unknown, it was probably caused by stress on the line.

Aggieville gains new businesses

■ 3 new restaurants open, offer students, community more dining selections.

By JEFF SUTTON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Aggieville recently has added three new flavors to its selection menu.

Mighty Fine Donuts, Costello's Pizza and Coco Bolos are new businesses unique to Aggieville. All were open by last weekend's Touchdown Weekend pep rally Friday night.

"I think they had a good weekend," said Cheryl Sieben, director of Aggieville Business Association. "This may be a first to have three businesses like that open within three weeks of each other and two of them open within a day of each other."

Mighty Fine Donuts has been open about a month and is the only doughnut vendor in Aggieville.

"It's been very busy," said Greg Shosa, production and counter employee. "Everyone who has come in here has said it's great to have a doughnut place."

Not only does the store open early, but it stays open from 10 p.m. to 3 a.m. from Wednesday through Saturday nights.

"We do really good after the bars close," Shosa said.

Another Aggieville first is Coco Bolos, which is located next to the New York Bagel Cafe. The southern New Mexico-style cuisine was opened by brothers Bud and Bobby Cox on Friday.

"Our family is from Las Cruces, New Mexico, and we've always been infatuated with the cuisine there," Bud Cox said. "We wanted to come to Manhattan and bring a different angle."

As a part owner of Hibachi Hut and Texas Star Cafe, Bud said he has been pleased with business during Coco Bolos' first week.

"It's crazy. We've really been packed since we opened the doors," he said.

Finally, Costello's Pizza, which also opened Friday, introduced a unique sourdough crust developed by its chef. Steve Paul, day manager, developed the original crust from his own recipe.

"It's almost the only place in Kansas that has authentic sourdough," Paul said.

He said Costello's is trying to offer an ethnic flavor for everyone.

"We want a high-class enough pizza and a working man's pizza but get it at a college student's price," Paul said.

Paul said the staff still is trying to work the bugs out but ultimately wants to attract the community.

"We're trying to change the way the town does pizza," he said. "We want to make sure we've got the best in town."

One rumor of another addition to Aggieville is the possibility of Old Navy or Gap clothing store.

"If it's what I've heard, those were rumors about what was going to go in the vacant lot, and that's not fact," Sieben said. "Nothing's even close to being settled on that yet."

Starr prepared for impeachment hearing

By LARRY MARGASAK
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr says President Clinton "repeatedly used the machinery of government and the powers of his office" to thwart Starr's grand-jury investigation and the Paula Jones lawsuit.

"That is not a private matter," Starr said in remarks prepared for delivery Thursday at the opening of impeachment hearings. A copy of his testimony was obtained late Wednesday by The Associated Press.

"The evidence further suggests that the president, in the course of these efforts, misused his authority and power as president and contravened his duty to faithfully execute the laws. That, too, is not a private matter," Starr said in challenging the argument that Starr had no right to investigate the president's consensual sexual relationship with Monica Lewinsky.

Starr's testimony reiterated many of the same allegations in the same harsh language that he included in his referral to Congress in September, accusing Clinton of 11 impeachable offenses. His testimony laid out a litany of examples that he said show a "misuse of presidential authority."

Starr said Clinton "made a series of premeditated false statements under oath" in his Jan. 17 deposition testimony in the Jones lawsuit and "participated in a scheme" at the deposition to deceive the trial judge in the lawsuit by not correcting his lawyer's false assertion that the president did not have sexual relations with Lewinsky.

Starr also said Clinton used his Cabinet as "unwitting surrogates" to support his false story, denying the affair for months. He charged that the president "concocted false alibis" to aides who then repeated the inaccurate information to the grand jury.

Starr eventually subpoenaed Clinton, who testified Aug. 17 before the grand jury. Starr said Clinton lied during that testimony, too and again when he told the American public in a speech that night that he had given "legally accurate" testimony in the Jones case.

Other misuses of power, according to Starr, came when Clinton and his administration asserted governmental privileges to conceal information from the grand jury.

Starr is the leadoff witness at the first impeachment hearings of a president in a quarter century. The House Judiciary Committee has given Starr two hours to present his evidence on Thursday, followed by questions from committee investigators and lawmakers.

Then, Clinton's private lawyer David Kendall will get a chance to question the independent counsel.

Starr, a former judge not accustomed to the politically charged atmosphere of congressional hearings, has been holding rehearsal sessions with his own staff.

Clinton, meanwhile, was visiting Japan and South Korea.

Committee Republicans signaled their intention to broaden the hearings, setting votes Thursday on subpoenas for four more witnesses: White House deputy counsel Bruce Lindsey, the president's most trusted adviser; attorney Robert Bennett, who represented Clinton in the Paula Jones lawsuit; Daniel Gecker, the lawyer for Clinton accuser Kathleen Willey; and Nathan Landow, a Maryland Democrat who had contacts with Willey. She has accused the president of a sexual advance inside the White House.

Committee chairman Henry Hyde also requested a Justice Department memo on alleged campaign fund-raising abuses from the 1996 campaign.

Starr said that in addition to misusing his authority, Clinton "used government resources and prerogatives to pursue his relationship with Monica Lewinsky" and used Oval Office secretary Betty Currie to "facilitate and conceal the relationship."

OUR VIEW

Long-term solution needed for parking

Representatives from TranSystems Corporation, the company hired by Parking Services to find solutions to our parking woes, were in Manhattan yesterday to unveil some of the plans they have developed.

It is our feeling that any decision made about the parking problem will ultimately affect the student body. We are eager to find the most satisfactory solution so that parking will not continue to be a problem that drags on perpetually. We don't want to make the same mistake with parking that we have with other campus projects — using a temporary solution to a large problem and then spending more and more simply to prevent the situation from becoming a more serious predicament.

We have done that in the past — became frightened by a price tag and vacillated on a decision for so long that when we finally do come around to solving the problem, we are daunted by the cost. The crumbling classrooms are a good example of this trend as are Hale Library and faculty salaries. We don't want parking to become another burden for K-State to throw on like a leaden robe — we merely want to see a solution, and we want it to be final.

That's the primary reason that we consider TranSystems' first suggestion for campus parking — the suggestion that Parking Services should do nothing — to be unacceptable.

Enrollment has increased significantly over the past year, and there is no reason to believe it will shrink any time in the near future. With the rise of public awareness about opportunities at K-State and an increased recognition by the public of K-State's academic prowess, we believe enrollment will, in fact, continue to climb. We must assume, then, that more students will bring more cars, and more cars will mean bigger parking problems.

Additionally, we are dependent upon campus visits for our recruiting. The lack of guest parking is apparent to prospective students, and the chaos that surrounds our parking situation cannot positively influence a visit from an out-of-town potential student. Unless we want our enrollment to drop — and we shouldn't, although it would solve the parking problem — doing nothing should not be an option.

Another option TranSystems offered was to raise meter rates and parking permit costs for students who want to park in the core of campus. Rates for parking meters in core lots would be raised to $1 an hour, and costs for parking permits in those lots would increase accordingly. In 1995, a rate hike in parking meters from 25 cents to 50 cents per hour effectively opened parking spaces in lot A-29, south of the K-State Student Union. At that time, Parking Services was trying to generate more revenue. Perhaps that would provide a temporary solution for us as well.

To a certain extent, we believe campus could use a shuttle system. The startup costs would be more prohibitive than increasing rates in the campus core lots, but it would allow students and visitors to use lots that are empty most of the time, like those at Bramlage Coliseum. A shuttle system would virtually guarantee students a parking spot, but there are problems to contend with: maintenance, vehicle storage, drivers, fuel, etc. Additionally, delays would be inevitable unless enough vehicles were purchased to handle the volume of students. Naturally, that drives costs up.

Our feeling is that the most promising plan thus far is the proposal to add a parking garage either to the Union lot or to the lots north of Durland and Waters halls. Both of these proposals are costly, but a parking garage at this point seems to be the most permanent solution. The Durland and Waters combination would add about 700 additional stalls, and the south Union lots would add about 500 more spaces. Concerns over the Union garage include worries about masking buildings and adding traffic to Anderson Avenue, even though the street is being expanded. The only concerns we can find about making the Durland and Waters lots into garages is the cost, which would reside with the students.

We would be footing the bill, but we would add new parking spaces, and we would get to keep our green space.

At this point, that seems to be the best option.

GOODBYE, CAMO BRICK ROAD

Why Fort Riley's days might be numbered

VIEWPOINT

WELLS

We had a guest speaker from abroad in class on Friday. During his lecture, he was disrupted somewhat by this bass "thrumm" sound that grew louder as time wore on.

Finally, flummoxed, he asked, "What is that noise?"

"Artillery," my instructor told him.

"They're not after me, are they?" he asked, concerned.

Some visitors are disturbed by that which we're jaded to, the window-rattling, sleep-jarring sounds of shelling from Fort Riley. The fort's just like any other neighbor you might have — any neighbor who has howitzers, of course.

Maybe you don't want to hear it, but it's time to be prepared. Fort Riley might not be long of this world.

I'm not saying this like someone ready to unload a whole bunch of Army people from the community. This area has recognized the value, both in financial terms and demographics, of Fort Riley; not only does its population bolster the Manhattan economy, but its military population serves as a refreshing counterpoint to the student body of K-State. This might not last.

Funny how a decade can change a community. Let's set the Wayback Machine for 1989: there was still a Soviet Union, people thought Milli Vanilli was cool and the K-State football team was getting beat in scrimmages against a horde of angry squirrels (you might find trees filled with footballs from almost a decade ago). There was a plan to expand Fort Riley back then, a plan several in the surrounding area reacted to quite angrily and with good reason — their homes were in the proposed expansion areas. The politics erupted — many concerned with the fiscal windfalls that an expanded Fort Riley could bring to the area, others concerned just with keeping their homes.

The discussions essentially disappeared with the Gulf War. Anti-expansionists didn't want to appear to stand against the troops in wartime, and Department of Defense cutbacks put Fort Riley on a list of possible closures. After several waves of closings, though, Fort Riley has emerged unscathed to date.

However, a lot has changed in the last nine years. The two people who kept Fort Riley open amid the base closings, Sens. Bob Dole and Nancy Kassebaum-Baker, have retired from the Senate. While their successors share many of the political allegiances as Dole and Baker, they do not have the political clout or experience that Dole and Baker used to keep the fort running.

At the same time, William Cohen has assumed the mantle of Secretary of Defense. Cohen might be a Republican, but he is more than capable of eschewing partisan thinking in favor of compromise, and this compromise might well take the form of conceding a base deep in the heart of traditionally Republican territory. Let's face it, the geographic location of the fort is appropriate only for repelling an invasion from Nebraska (and is sadly redundant with the football team now in place); the base is using resources the Army probably would like located near a coast to ease in deployment.

Let me reiterate — I'm not saying Fort Riley should be closed. I'm well aware that the fort is home to a number of programs and personnel of tremendous value to the Army. But so were other bases that are now inert, closed not as much on the basis of their inherent value to the armed services but because of focused lobbying by senators and representatives in Washington, D.C., particularly those on the Armed Services Committee.

If the fort closes, the result will be devastating, obviously even more so in Geary County than in Riley County. I'm not suggesting anything more than that the communities in the area be prepared should the word come down. Kansas' lobbying power is a fraction of what it was nine years ago, and Fort Riley's already-tenuous survival seems even more questionable when the next base closings roll around. It is imperative to be prepared to say goodbye to our friends in camouflage if they are called elsewhere.

Perhaps the dull roar of the shelling is disturbing, but the business district should fear the silence.

School choice is answer to failing educational system

VIEWPOINT

SACKETT

Free enterprise has worked in nearly every scope of this country. It is working in Wisconsin in the form of school choice. Why not throughout our entire educational system?

Last week, the Supreme Court decided not to accept a case that would have determined the constitutionality of Wisconsin's school-voucher reforms. While it might be unfortunate that a decision was not made, Wisconsin will continue with its successful program.

The program provides $4,900 in vouchers to Milwaukee students, the same amount the state pays the Milwaukee public schools per pupil. The vouchers then can be applied to private or public education.

As it remains in our country, most low-income families are forced to send their children to public schools. These schools are the result of a system designed more than 150 years ago. While the system worked then, it clearly is failing now. We have metal detectors, drug-sniffing dogs and condom distribution in schools.

In a 1993 study conducted on the brightest students from 13 countries, the U.S. Department of Education found that Americans ranked ninth in physics, 11th in chemistry and last in biology.

We are no longer the leaders in educational achievement. According to Christopher D. Pixley's Constitutional analysis of school-choice legislation, corporate America spends $25 billion a year teaching employees basic skills that should have been learned in school. These include seventh-grade math and English skills.

As a result, we are losing jobs in high-technology companies to out-of-country employees whose math, computer and science skills are better than ours.

No government educational system established for the children should take priority over the children. Unfortunately, the National Education Association does not see it this way.

NEA president Bob Chase was quoted in The Los Angeles Times as saying, "Every day, the voucher plan does more damage to the Milwaukee public schools, and the city's taxpayers are paying the tab."

What Chase overlooks is that the children's education is improving in Milwaukee. Instead of advocating financial assistance based on cost efficiency and student achievement, the NEA only seems to be concerned about losing power. What it should do is work with people who have found ways to reform the old system using the principles of free enterprise.

I understand the importance of not destroying the public schools. Both sides should work together to ensure that any transitions occur smoothly. However, we must do something about improving our educational system.

When parents are allowed to choose where their children attend school, the principles of free enterprise come into play. This results in the inefficient schools being absorbed by the more proficient ones. Survival of the fittest — isn't that a theory taught in science class?

Of the 6,200 Milwaukee parents, most of them seem to be liking the program. If they decide they don't like it, they can always opt to send their children back to the public schools. It is the parent's choice, not governments.

There has been concern expressed over possible government funding of religious schools — thus, a violation of the First Amendment. But allowing indirect government funds to benefit religious schools is constitutional as long as there is free choice on behalf of the individual parents. After all, it is their tax dollars being spent.

Most private schools operate on budgets far less than what is seemingly necessary for public schools. Yet, the private schools are better educating children in academics, self-worth and morals.

We are free in America to choose the best education for our children. This should not just be a privilege for the wealthy.

It would do the NEA good to recognize the positive benefits of allowing schools to compete for quality education. This competition would improve both public and private education resulting in better education for the children.

Library employees aid less fortunate families with holiday food drive

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Thanksgiving is only a week away, and many students are preparing to return home to enjoy a Thanksgiving feast. However, some are not fortunate enough to put a turkey on their table.

The employees of Hale Library, however, are trying to change this.

Through the staff association at the library, the employees are sponsoring a food drive, and all donations will go to the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

"It started out as primarily an internal drive, but we have extended it to all students," said Beth Turtle, associate professor in the science library.

The food drive began last week and runs through Friday. Boxes are distributed throughout the library so students can bring non-perishable food to be donated to less-fortunate families for the holidays.

"We are contributing to our community and helping others have a good Thanksgiving," Turtle said.

The library's goal is 300 pounds of food or an equal amount of dollars. The food that has been collected will be taken Friday to the Breadbasket. Turtle said she has seen a couple of boxes that already are full.

Shirley Bramhall, executive director of the Flint Hills Breadbasket, said food still is being donated for the holiday baskets. Through Cats for Cans, a university-wide food drive, the Breadbasket should be able to reach its goal of filling all the baskets.

"There are an awful lot of families that live month to month. If something happens such as a car breaking down, higher utilities or having to buy winter coats, they just can't make it," Bramhall said. "This is one less thing they will have to worry about."

The holiday baskets for Thanksgiving will be distributed Monday. Work then will begin on the baskets needed for Christmas.

"If the response is good this time around, we might consider doing it at Christmas," Turtle said.

Those interested in making cash donations should send it to the Mayor's Holiday Tree Fund or directly to the Breadbasket.

Food donations should be delivered to the Breadbasket from 8:30 a.m. to noon and 1 p.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday, although the Breadbasket opens at 10 a.m. Wednesdays.

National downsizing effort causes Town Center store to close doors

By TIM RICHARDSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Limited is closing its doors in Manhattan Town Center next year after 11 years.

Store employees said they weren't given any specific reasons why the Manhattan store is among 47 stores closing nationwide. The Limited in Topeka also will close.

"Our business for the last two years has been wonderful, so it was very unexpected," said Kari Quitten-Beard, store manager in Manhattan.

The store likely will be shut down by Feb. 15, though no exact date has been set.

Andy Carlson, general manager of Manhattan Town Center, said the decision is part of a nationwide downsizing for the company, which also owns Bath and Body Works, Victoria's Secret, Express, Structure and other stores.

"Limited is kind of rethinking how it does business," Carlson said. "It's an underperforming format for The Limited company."

He said The Limited Inc. is closing some of its Limited stores to focus on expanding those in other markets.

A new clothing store will be coming to the mall to replace The Limited in spring or summer of next year. Carlson declined to comment on the name of the store.

Quitten-Beard said some of The Limited's 15 employees have been offered jobs in other locations, such as Kansas City, Mo., but many of the employees will not make the move.

"We made every goal they had for us," she said. "I don't think it was in our control at all."

Quitten-Beard said she has seen a lot of customers surprised with the decision and unhappy to see the store leave Manhattan.

"People are very upset," she said. "I think there is a lot of concern that there are not a lot of women's apparel stores in the mall."

Quitten-Beard received the news of the store closing three weeks ago. She said she doesn't want to see it go but understands the decisions large companies must make.

"I love Manhattan, and I love this store. I was surprised and unhappy," she said, "but I also work for a huge corporation that makes choices that I have no control over."

DB92's 'Sports Talk' takes off

■ Barroom atmosphere sets the scene for hosts to talk sports, take calls

By SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In the corner of the Purple Pig Tavern on Tuesday night, two guys decked out in K-State gear absent-mindedly glance at the KU basketball game broadcast above them. Although their appearance may not differ from a majority of students on campus, the two possess one thing that sets them apart: They are hosts of "Sports Talk," an hour-long sports show that broadcasts from 9 to 10 p.m. every Tuesday on KSDB-FM 91.9.

Dave Smoller, senior in advertising, and Jeff Dickson, graduate in electronic media, discuss various sports like K-State football, hockey, basketball and pretty much any sports topic making headlines. Smoller said they try to make the show a laid-back discussion of the latest news in sports.

"Most of the time, our script is just stories off the wire, and we sort of paraphrase those and make our own comments," Smoller said.

"What we go for is what you'd overhear in an apartment somewhere in Manhattan, just a couple guys talking sports," he said.

Tuesday was the second week the show was broadcast from the Purple Pig. Previously, it was broadcast from McCain Auditorium. Smoller said they are working to make the bar its regular location. Keith Eyestone, owner of the Purple Pig, said negotiations are underway.

"We're talking about making it permanent right now, for this semester and next," Eyestone said. "If it's beneficial for both parties, I think we'll do it."

Tuesday's show drew 13 patrons to the bar, but Eyestone said he expected

WILDCAT BASKETBALL DOUBLEHEADER

COACH DEB PATTERSON FINDS

SMILE

Women's team tops century mark in win

For the first time since 1991, the K-State women's basketball team broke the century mark, defeating Eastern Kentucky 102-68.

"We definitely needed to have that type of a breakout game," K-State coach Deb Patterson said.

The Cats were looking to rebound from an opening night loss to Ohio State on Monday night.

"Everyone was disappointed about that close loss to Ohio State, and we just wanted to go out and play hard and win," center Angie Finkes said.

Finkes had 24 points, and the Cats shot 54 percent from the field. K-State had five players score in double figures.

In the first half, forward Nicki Ramage and Finkes accounted for eighteen of the team's first 20 points.

Patterson said she was pleased with the way her front court players played and said the inside players are learning the tools necessary to play inside.

"They're understanding that you've got to want the ball and that you have got to score strong," Patterson said.

Off the bench, forward Heather Smith scored eight straight first half points and finished with 12. Patterson said Smith appears to be gaining more confidence.

"I think for the first time today, we saw her step up and play strong in a game," Patterson said.

Also off the K-State bench, 6 foot, 6 inch center Olga Firsova provided the team with help on the boards and defensive end. Firsova had two blocks on one possession and finished the game with 18 points and 10 rebounds.

Patterson said Firsova's play was encouraging.

"I thought it was a really positive sign that we got Olga Firsova involved in the game," Patterson said.

Patterson said her bench played well overall. "Unlike the other night, we saw our bench contribute, and that really helped us put some points on the board," she said.

In the second half, the Cats got into foul trouble early, and Eastern Kentucky wound up shooting in the bonus most of the half.

Nicki Ramage fouled out with 7:04 remaining in the game and ended with 15 points. Firsova would follow Ramage to the bench when she picked up her fifth foul at the 3:41 mark.

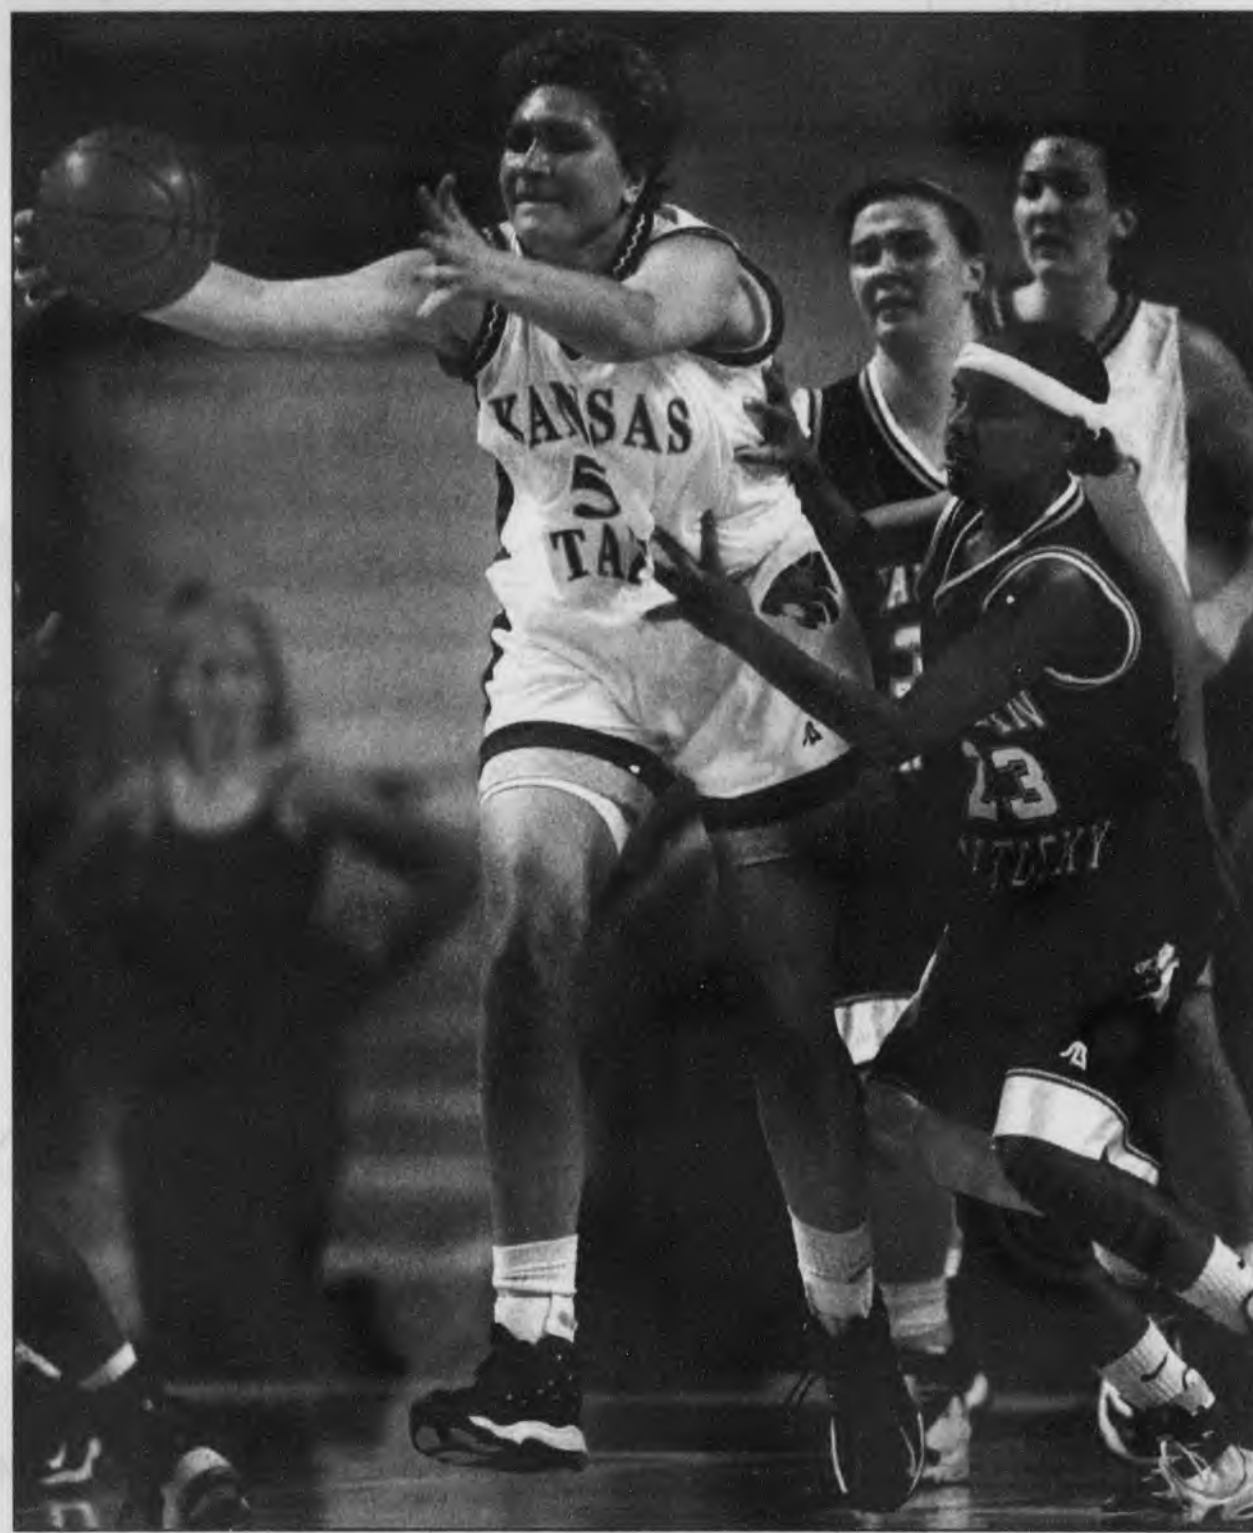

Guard Kristin Rethman played the game with a thumb injury on her right hand and will have it evaluated sometime this week.

"Some of her opportunities were limited, and we weren't real sure of wanting to put her in harm's way," Patterson said. "Obviously, we need her on the floor."

Patterson said the win shows the team is developing chemistry.

"We had a tough game Monday night, a tough loss, and to come back tonight and make some improvements, it's gonna help us, because we've established a bench presence," Patterson said.

The next game for the Cats is on the road against Drake on November 22.

K-State center Olga Firsova (5) wrestles the basketball away from Eastern Kentucky guard Mikki Bond (23) during second-half action Wednesday night at Bramlage Coliseum. Firsova's 18 points and 10 rebounds off the bench helped the Wildcats win 102-68. This is the first time since 1991 that the K-State women's basketball team scored 100 points in a game.

Men's team moves to 3-0 with 76-60 win against Ichabods

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Four Wildcat players scored in double figures as K-State ousted intrastate foe Washburn 76-60 Wednesday night at Bramlage Coliseum.

The win brings the Cats to 3-0 on the season.

The community-college transfer tandem of guard Cortez Groves and forward Tony Kitt led the way for the Cats. Kitt poured in a career high 17 points and grabbed seven rebounds, while Groves added 11 points.

Senior forward Shawn Rhodes and senior guard/forward Josh Reid each scored 10. Freshman guard Josh Kimm dished out seven assists.

"Tony gets a lot done," Asbury said. "He's dynamic and explosive. He's a dominant player. His stamina isn't quite where we want it, but he was seven for eight in only 18 minutes."

Topped off by a Manny Dies alley-oop from Cortez Groves, the Cats took off to a quick 7-0 start. The Ichabods capitalized on Wildcat turnovers, however, and kept the first half close. With Shawn Rhodes tossing in two baskets in the last minute, K-State went on an 8-2 run to end the half 38-31.

"I wasn't worried going into the second half," Kitt said. "Coach told us to get out and play, so we had our mind set to do our best. It's just a matter of wanting the ball and getting big. We played hard."

The Wildcats took advantage of Washburn's shooting woes by shooting 51.6 percent from the floor and blocking seven Ichabod shots.

"We had a spurt in the second half where we just pounded them on both ends of the floor," Asbury said. "To Washburn's credit, it was a good test."

Despite 19 turnovers, the Cats still beat its Division II opponent by 16.

"Washburn is a good team," Asbury said. "They are every bit of prepared and sound as a Division I team. They're not as deep as Division I teams, but they are well coached, focused, and they play hard."

Even though the Ichabods are a Division II team, Groves said the Cats didn't underestimate them.

"We take every team seriously," he said.

Since the Cats did have a size advantage against the Ichabods, whose tallest player is just 6 foot, 8 inches tall, Kitt said K-State just tried to pound it inside.

"The post play set the tone for the game," he said. "Just another day on the job."

Asbury said K-State was hoping to wear Washburn down.

"We hoped and anticipated to tire them down," he said. "The defense was descent. We were just bigger and stronger than them."

Groves said the inside attack opened shots for him and the other guards.

Even though the Cats extended their record to 3-0, they have yet to have a big game from senior forward and 1997-98 second-team all-Big 12 Conference selection Dies.

"Manny hasn't had a big game yet, but he'll be there," Asbury said. "He's trying real hard."

Next week, the Wildcats travel to Hawaii to take on Indiana in the Maui Invitational. Asbury said he hopes the tournament will be a learning experience for the team.

"The season has started early, and teams really aren't quite ready to play and play well," Asbury said. "What concerns me is our offensive efficiency."

Coach Tom Asbury yells at officials after a controversial last-second call before heading to the locker room at the end of the first half.

With the way the league had been deteriorating, NBA is Fan-Tastic when courts are empty

VIEWPOINT

VIETTI

With the addition of NBA Commissioner David Stern's thick gray-silver beard, a comparison, in more than one way, can and should be made between the Commish and the Tin Man from The Wizard of Oz.

Ah, but wait, there's plenty more where that came from.

How about the Player's Union head man Billy Hunter? Yep, I'm guessing the two were fraternal twins.

And what about mega-sports agent David Falk? I certainly can see the resemblance between the Tin Man and Falk. Perhaps they are first cousins, or maybe step-brothers.

Okay, okay, I know what you're saying, but the fact is that I haven't been on the unfortunate end of too many lobotomies. The genetic quality that brings the aforementioned individuals together is that all began life without that thing biologists call a heart. But now, due mostly to that all-America trait called greed, each of these fine, upstanding citizens can honestly say they roam the streets of America with a five pound, red-thing pumping in their chest.

Did I lose you? Well, I hope not, because my brain functions at about the same level as that of a second grader with a learning disorder.

I'll explain: What is the one prominent professional sport where any male sports fan would rather watch "Sleepless in Seattle" all day, every day than be forced to sit through a pointless regular-season game?

For the female sports enthusiasts out there, what is the one top professional sport in which watching a "Three Stooges" marathon every night of the week would be more entertaining than a regular-season contest?

If you guessed hockey, you're close, but I'll save that for another column. The declared winner of a nationwide poll I conducted all by myself, where the only pollsters were me, myself and I is the National Basketball Association.

Still there? Probably not, but I'll continue.

Now, who knows what has been going on the past few months or so with the NBA? If you said players not getting their paychecks — who, on the average, make more money than any other professional athletes — then you're partially right.

However, the most important item of note when examining the NBA labor dispute between the owners and the players is the fact that, and make sure you read this part: NO NBA GAMES HAVE BEEN PLAYED!

All praise and glory should be directed toward Davey and his evangelists. They now have hearts, because we now have lost those repugnant regular-season games.

Hooray! Yippee! I'm not a religious man, but now, I'm quite certain that God is up there somewhere watching over us. Really, is there another explanation? I think not.

Basketball fans have had to put up with the deterioration of the NBA since the late, great 1980s when Larry Bird and Magic Johnson reigned supreme over Dr.

James Naismith's forum. At least back in those days, a person could sit and be entertained by an early-season NBA game where you could count on at least three or four players having the ability to make a shot other than a dunk. Can we honestly say that now? The words "Hell no" come to my mind.

But back to the matter at hand. Is there anyone out there in the wide, wide world of sports who cares that they can't flip on the television and see Kobe Bryant hog the ball from the other Los Angeles Lakers? What kind of person is sitting at home thinking, "Hey, it's Tuesday night, time for that awesome showdown on TNT between the Warriors and the Kings?" If there is such a fellow, may God have mercy on his soul.

Let's return to the instigator of our happiness: Davey Stern and his fellow members of the "We Now Have a Heart Club." Suppose those leaders are thinking of you and me, the exhausted NBA fans, who just might internally combust if we endure another 59-58 professional basketball game. I think they are. Now say this with excitement, "I won't have to watch an NBA game until the playoffs!"

Did it work? If not, give Latrell Sprewell a call, and he'll fix you right up — just ask Rick Adelman.

The Commish and his cohorts have strategically planned the best way to satisfy all avid NBA fans — except for maybe Spike Lee — by eliminating the absolute, most redundant and pointless exhibition of entertainment on the face of the globe: The NBA regular season.

Hallelujah!
Also, remember this: If the lockout ends (Hell already froze over once a few days ago), then Spike Lee won't be able to direct his hilarious commercials begging the NBA to cease the lockout.

It's a hard-knock life without the NBA regular season.

Authentic belly dancing lessons offered at K-State

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Opportunities abound for students interested in learning a new dance style.

Students searching for a vastly different style of dance could try the International Student Center's Middle Eastern Belly Dancing lessons tonight. Classes begin at 8:30, and for a $5 entry fee, aspiring dancers can watch and participate in dances that have existed for centuries.

"Middle Eastern dances have entirely different moves and a different mentality behind them than other styles," said Ferdoas Afani Ruzik, sophomore in political science and class instructor.

Afani Ruzik spent her childhood in many regions of the Middle East and picked up the finer points of belly dancing from friends and family.

"We would do it at weddings and birthday parties, just for fun," she said. "It takes a little practice, but it isn't too hard to learn."

The types of belly dancing portrayed on television and in movies usually are Westernized and not entirely accurate, Afani Ruzik said. The Middle Eastern dances she teaches will be much more authentic, using a mix of traditional and modern music.

"There's a unique balance between the traditional music and Western music," Afani Ruzik said. "I like to use modern music out of Egypt when I dance."

Although Middle Eastern dancing is designed more for women, men interested in attending also could learn a move or two. Afani Ruzik said she is hoping for a big turnout, and she is willing to show anyone the proper way to belly dance.

"It's just really nice to see people who are willing to try a new experience," she said.

TAKE LESSONS

Belly dancing lessons are being offered at 8:30 p.m. tonight in the International Student Center. Cost is $5. For more info, call Ferdoas Afani Ruzik at 395-2720.

"When you're in a small setting, you can literally see everyone there," Hunt said. "It's almost better in a way, because you can kind of let them in on the secret (of the performance)."

Hunt was born in Kansas City, Kan., but spent most of her childhood in Emporia. The musical tastes of her parents included the stylings of Ray Charles, Billie Holiday and Professor Longhair, and these led to her fascination with blues and jazz.

"Blues purists love her because they recognize her influences through her work," Burban said.

Years of piano lessons helped refine Hunt's talent and build a love for performing. In high school, Hunt joined an area band and acquired a feel for the spotlight. The School of Fine Arts and Music at the University of Kansas further developed Hunt's skills and propelled her toward her career as a performance artist.

Hunt's self-titled album, released in 1994, has grown in popularity through touring. When featured at shows such as the Kansas City Blues and Jazz Festival, she is hands-down the leader in compact disc sales among performers. "Kelley Hunt" can be found in many record shops around Manhattan, including Streetside Records.

A selection from the album, "If I Don't Dance," was made popular earlier this year when it was featured on the soundtrack of the film "Dance With Me," starring Vanessa Williams.

Four years of touring took up a lot of Hunt's time, but fans be assured that after months of recording sessions, a second album could be released as early as spring. Although Hunt is dedicated to recording her next album, her touring has been a bit more exciting than the numerous hours spent in a soundproof booth.

"The energy level can be a notch or two higher in a live performance," Hunt said. "Getting feedback gives you a physical and mental energy with your music."

The tours might have been fun, but Hunt said she is glad to be back in Kansas. After her Hibachi Hut appearance, Hunt will move on to concert dates in Springfield, Mo., and a Nov. 28 performance at Kansas City's Grand Emporium.

Tickets for Thursday's all-ages show are $7 and can be purchased at the Hibachi Hut during normal business hours.

Hip-hop/funk band Pomeroy cuts new demo; distinctive CD set for release next semester

By SARAH FLORIE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan music scene is growing each year.

Bands from this college town are gaining recognition not only in this area, but by working with recording studios in Lawrence and Kansas City, they are cutting demo tapes and albums that get them noticed throughout the state and beyond.

One of the Manhattan bands on the rise is the hip-hop/funk band Pomeroy, winner of the 1998 OPUS Live Band Competition at K-State.

By releasing a four-song demo, simply titled "Pomeroy, Summer 1998 Demo," the band will be giving its fans a preview of its full-length compact disc, which will be released next semester.

"We will be back in the studio in late December, hopefully, and will have our full-length out by the first of the year," said David Fairbanks, vocalist and percussionist for Pomeroy.

By far, the best song on this demo is the funkadelic tune "Let Me Turn the Mic On." This song, and others on this demo, is sort of 311-esque or reminiscent of The U2 but intertwined with Pomeroy's home-grown style. Its fast, alterna-reggae beat really could make listeners want to jump up and dance.

The songs "Summer Night" and "Played" are slower than the other two and make the listener realize that these boys really have some vocal talent and are able to harmonize.

Although the actual compact disc version of this demo only is available to recording companies, cassette-tape versions are available to anyone.

At each of the band's live shows, it graciously invites fans to purchase this collection of hits, which features the same songs as the CD and with the same recording quality.

So, if you're itching to hear one of the more distinctive sounds of the local band scene, check out Pomeroy's cassette demo and look for more from them by the first of the year.

Nationally known jazz, blues artist returns to perform in native Kansas

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nationally recognized singer, songwriter and piano player Kelley Hunt has returned to her native Kansas to perform at 9:30 tonight at Hibachi Hut.

Hunt's mix of rhythm and blues, jazz and "roots rock" results in a unique sound that has earned her recognition all over the country. She has performed at many established jazz and blues festivals, including the St. Louis Blues Heritage Festival, the third-largest in the United States.

The House of Blues Radio Network and Beale Street Caravan, as well as other radio networks and their nationally syndicated programs, regularly feature her original songs and help her build a strong fan base.

"One of the things that makes Kelley unique is that her show doesn't recycle the same old blues repertoire," Al Burban, Hunt's manager, said. "The fans can see that."

Although the Hibachi Hut might be a bit too small to accommodate the type of crowd Hunt usually attracts, she said she isn't too worried about the effect it will have on her performance.

attendance to increase as the show becomes more well known.

The Purple Pig features two television and numerous historical sports photographs, creating atmosphere for the show. However, the overall structure of the Purple Pig makes it hard to hear the hosts of the show from inside the bar — one factor that kept patrons from paying closer attention to "Sports Talk."

"I guess you don't really come down here to listen to the show, but it is cool to see how it works," Heather Hansen, junior in English, said.

Eyestone said the broadcast gives students an opportunity to check out the bar and to see how the radio show is produced.

"I think it's great," Eyestone said. "It's another good draw for the bar, and students can also see how our Sports Talk show is done."

This is the third year the show has aired, said guest host Nate Burnau, senior in electronic journalism. Burnau was filling in for Dickson due to illness. In previous years, the show had four hosts, but this year, the station switched to two hosts and guest experts who specialize in various sports.

Tuesday's expert specialized in college basketball and discussed KU's lack of depth and K-State's strengths this year.

The majority of Tuesday's show was spent discussing K-State football. Smoller's opinions of UCLA and Tennessee echoed the sentiments of many K-State fans.

"I'm just saying that both teams suck, and K-State is the best team in the country," Smoller said.

Students have the opportunity to voice their opinions by calling in to the show and talking with the hosts. Smoller said they usually receive 4-5 calls per show.

Eyestone said he anticipates an increase in Tuesday night attendance, if the show continues to air from his bar.

"I hope we do work something out," Eyestone said. "I expect Tuesday nights to pick up."

GOP

127-95 over Largent on the final ballot, after the low vote recipient dropped off following previous rounds.

Rep. Tom DeLay, the GOP whip, was re-elected without opposition.

Watts' victory as new chairman of the GOP conference, or caucus, came at the expense of Ohio Rep. John Boehner, who was seeking his third term. Watts, a telegenic former University of Oklahoma football star, triumphed, 121-93, a victory made sweeter because it fell on his 41st birthday. Whatever his formal leadership duties, Watts is likely to become a familiar face on television and before Republican audiences around the country as the party seeks to broaden its appeal.

"I think it's good for the Republican Party for America to know that the Republican Party — that we're a party of men and women, and red, yellow, brown, black and white Americans," he told reporters. "I think we want to say to everybody that you're welcome in the Republican Party."

Rep. John Linder of Georgia, whom Gingrich had tapped to head the campaign committee, was also swept from office by Republicans seeking a change in leadership. Rep. Tom Davis of Virginia topped him, with a strong assist from Del. Hastert retained his leadership post.

"People were ready for a change," said Rep. Matt Salmon of Arizona after Watts' victory.

They got it, too, beginning at the top, where Livingston has pledged a more businesslike, less revolutionary political style than Gingrich practiced.

In departing, Gingrich — who frequently struggled to hold a fractious rank-and-file together — said Livingston's success will "depend in large measure on whether the people in the room stand united," according to Ray LaHood of Illinois, a Republican who heard his remarks. Livingston praised Gingrich, too. "Newt seized greatness," he said.

"History will speak his name."

He made no mention of social issues, such as abortion, that frequently divide Republicans and polarize the electorate. Nor did he touch on the impeachment inquiry pending in the Judiciary Committee, although others have said he wants the issue concluded before he takes office in January.

At the same time, he showed his partisan side.

"We will preserve the Social Security trust fund from the raids begun by Lyndon Johnson and the Democrat Congresses," Livingston said.

"And our priority must be to balance the budget and cut taxes. And for the sake of our children and the future of our country, we must provide education reform."

Livingston offered no specifics, and it will be extraordinarily difficult to move legislation through the House without bipartisan cooperation given the slender, 12-seat majority held by the GOP.

The Louisiana Republican referred to Democrats when he said he wanted to serve in a tradition "that fosters cooperation and respect. We Republicans lose nothing by reaching out to the other side, to talk and listen and work in tandem with those who may share some of our goals and dreams."

Even as he acknowledged the difficulty of the task, Livingston cautioned fellow Republicans not to interpret the Nov. 3 election returns as a defeat.

The GOP holds a majority, he said. "Let's make sure we don't misinterpret a warning for a whipping."

away games.

"The band and athletics are on the same team, and if we could, we would fund a pep band for away games, but it is understood that our budget is tight and cannot afford to fund the band in that way," Cavello said. "We do fund the band and support them in any way possible."

Band member Joey Schneider, senior in architectural engineering, said he thought it would be beneficial to send a pep band to away games if the band could find more funding.

"I think the band really adds to crowd participation, but funding for travel would have to come from some other department," Schneider said.

Wednesday, Friday and Saturday at about 40 to 50 hours a week."

However, Kasselmann said he'd miss working with the team.

"I'll miss the competitiveness," he said.

The team completed an undefeated fall season, with wins in Wichita, Kansas City, Louisville and several other cities. Team members said they're ready for a break.

"It's a relief," said Samantha Cross, senior in animal science.

"It will be weird to have some free time."

This is the sixth time Schaaque has been part of a national championship. Before K-State's winning streak, he was part of the 1983 winning team and earned the highest individual score.

Although Schaaque said he tried not to pressure his students with the university's winning streak, the quote from an unknown author that hangs on his wall, among the many awards his teams have won, says something about their attitude:

"My competitors are diligent, attentive, aggressive and would take my business away from me if they could. They keep me alert and make me search for ways to improve my product and services. If I had no competitors I could become lazy, incompetent and inattentive. I need the discipline they force upon me. I salute my competitors. They have been good to me. God bless them all!"

2 halls to remain open during break

BY JAMI STUMP

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For the past 10 years, students have had the option of staying in the residence halls during vacation periods, depending on the occupancy in the hall, said Derek Jackson, residence life director for Housing and Dining Services.

Jackson said 70-75 students will be staying in Marlatt and Haymaker halls during the Thanksgiving break. Students will be charged $8 a night to stay in one of the two halls.

The residence halls close for Thanksgiving next Wednesday and will reopen Sunday, Nov. 29.

"Students may not necessarily stay here the entire time," Jackson said.

"They may go home for a while and come back early."

Karrie Mitchell, assistant residence life coordinator for Haymaker Hall, said she thinks the residence halls staying open is a real benefit for students who are far from home or are from foreign countries.

"I think it is really nice for residence life to offer to keep the residence halls open, especially for international students," Mitchell said.

Students will be on their own for meals during the vacation holiday, Mitchell said. Food services will not be offered during the break.

"Staff will be there to do rounds and make sure that things are going good, basically to take care of any problems that may arise," said Randi Waddell, assistant residence life coordinator for Marlatt Hall.

Jackson said only those who have signed up and are living in the residence hall during the break will be allowed inside.

"The buildings will be locked up, and only people that have signed up will be admitted inside," Jackson said. "All other students will have their cards deactivated during the break."

The sign-up deadline was 5 p.m. Nov. 12.

As of Friday morning, when the halls determined rooms available and made room assignments, all who had requested to stay in a hall were accepted.

PARKING

price differentials to decrease the number of people who desire to park in the core part of campus. Cost of parking permits for lots closer to campus would increase by 50 percent, and meters would increase to $1 per hour.

"We estimate that 15 to 20 percent of existing core-area parking customers will relocate to lots further from the core," Swenson said.

Another part of this option is to give 5 to 10 percent of the lots that are currently reserved for faculty and staff to students and visitors. Swenson said many of these parking spots often are not used due to sicknesses and travel. Utilizing these spaces would allow for space management. This option would cost the university $150,000 on an annual basis.

For each option, the cost would be paid annually for the next 20 years.

Swenson said K-State still has the option of building a parking garage at the K-State Student Union. This option has an annual cost of $1,377,375. It will provide 500 additional parking spaces.

Swenson said there are some disadvantages to a parking garage at this location.

He said this will increase the traffic on Anderson Avenue, which is already heavily traveled. The cost also is a big disadvantage, but the garage would create a safer environment and ease the parking problems throughout campus, Swenson said.

The fourth option is building two parking garages at the north end of the campus.

"Potential locations include the lots north of the Waters Annex and the lot north of Durland," Swenson said.

The two structures would have an annual cost of $1,651,469. Swenson said putting the garages in these two spots might be more beneficial to students' parking needs.

TranSystems also proposed three different options involving a shuttle bus system. The first of these options would allow people to park further away and take a shuttle into campus. This shuttle service would mimic the current route parking services shuttles take now with an extension to the football stadium lots. The current shuttle stops at the KSU

The garage would create a safer environment and ease the parking problems throughout campus, Swenson said.

Foundation building, the Union and Edwards Hall.

The annual cost of a shuttle system like this would be $342,500.

Other options involving a shuttle bus system include using routes that stop more frequently, closer to campus and in the surrounding neighborhoods. These options would demand higher costs to accommodate the number of shuttles needed, but it would reduce the amount of vehicles on campus.

Swenson said students who are willing to park farther away and ride the shuttle likely would pay less for parking permits, while those who want to park closer to campus would have to pay more.

"We are at a comfortable level of parking now," Swenson said. "At the peak hour of the day, 71 percent of the parking spaces are filled, but this is not where people want it to be."

TranSystems is still taking surveys from people who would like to voice their opinion. Forms can be filled out on their World Wide Web site, www.tran-systems.com/manhattan.

Residents fear repercussions of building new Wal-Mart

By ELIZABETH SCHOFIELD
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

What is now 22 acres of undeveloped land on the west side of Manhattan soon might become the site of a Wal-Mart Supercenter.

While some people are excited about the idea of a store of this nature being constructed in Manhattan, others say they will do all they can to prevent the Wal-Mart Supercenter from pushing its way into town.

A Wal-Mart Supercenter is a combination of the general merchandise store and a full-service grocery store. The site Wal-Mart is looking to purchase for the Supercenter is a 22-acre lot owned by Jim Johns at the intersection of Fort Riley Boulevard and Seth Childs Road. A residential area nearby is a source of some contention.

Carolyn Anderson, 3000 Tamarak Drive, is one opponent of the Wal-Mart proposal. Her home is only a few blocks from the possible location. She, along with neighbors and other concerned citizens, has formed the Warner Park-

Arbor Heights Neighborhood Association.

About 40 to 50 people have signed the roster for the association, Anderson said. The committee has met six times over the past month and a half and has had about 20 people regularly attend meetings.

The group is concerned the residential area will be affected adversely by the new store. The noise level, lights, increased litter and traffic all are concerns.

"We want to preserve a quiet, safe, clean neighborhood," Anderson said.

She said the concern with traffic is that, in a neighborhood where there are no sidewalks and no need for them, the streets would not be safe for children on bikes and parents with baby strollers.

"We feel customers will take the back way out," Anderson said.

The backway from the proposed site of the Supercenter would be Arbor Drive to Warner Park Road, which connects to Highway 18. These streets are in residential areas.

Another concern is the effect of the Supercenter on existing Manhattan businesses.

Anderson said the committee feels smaller businesses in town will not survive, and they will disappear one by one.

"We believe a domino effect would happen with businesses," Anderson said.

Joe Knopp, local attorney for Wal-Mart, said he cannot understand this argument.

"The issue of discount stores in communities is somewhat an issue of the 1970s," Knopp said, referring to Wal-Mart's presence in Manhattan for more than 20 years.

Wal-Mart public relations representative Daphne Davis said that in the past, the trend has involved local businesses benefiting from Wal-Mart's presence.

"The overall impact of our operations is very positive," Davis said. "Competition makes you a better business, and competition is best for the consumer."

The committee opposing the Wal-Mart Supercenter is not trying to combat all commercial development on this land, they just do not want a store of this scale that will be open 24 hours a day, Anderson said.

They also do not see the need for another Wal-Mart store in Manhattan as the Wal-Mart on the east side of town will remain open.

"We really don't have a deficiency in stores right now," Anderson said. Davis said the Supercenter provides a place where customers can accomplish several tasks at once.

"We're all busy these days," she said. "There's a level of convenience for consumers."

Davis said plans are in the preliminary stages. Wal-Mart is working on a proposal to change the zoning of the property to be presented to the Manhattan City Commission. "We do our best to present a propos-

Group concerned about neighborhood trees

By ELIZABETH SCHOFIELD
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The neighborhood group opposed to the Wal-Mart Supercenter also is upset about the trees the company would cut down to make room for the supercenter.

The Warner Park-Arbor Heights Neighborhood Association has expressed concern about the effects the proposed Wal-Mart Supercenter will have on the trees covering its neighborhood.

Carolyn Anderson, who sparked neighborhood in forming the group, said the neighborhood has a natural environment and it would like it to keep that way.

"We have a treasure of trees," Anderson said. "We want to preserve Warner Park."

The preliminary proposal the group has seen shows a total of 16 trees to be planted on 19 acres of land.

"They said they'd leave some trees," Anderson said. "We all laughed at it."

Wal-Mart public-relations representative Daphne Davis said the proposal submitted to the city will take the type of area being developed into consideration.

"We always take the environment into account," Davis said.

Joe Knopp, local attorney for Wal-Mart, said in the preliminary proposal, all the trees along Shuss Road would stay. In fact, Knopp said, Wal-Mart is choosing not to cut into the hill to preserve the trees. This means the store would not be visible from Fort Riley Boulevard, with the exception of a tall sign Wal-Mart would most likely put up to show its location.

"For tree huggers everywhere, this is a great proposal," Knopp said.

"THE SITUATIONS ARE SO DIFFERENT THAT YOU'RE NOT GOING TO DO THE SAME THING OVER AND OVER AGAIN."

— WEST HALL RESIDENT ASSISTANT SUMMER BROWN

Summer Brown, junior in elementary education, is the resident assistant for West Hall's fourth-floor A-wing. This is Brown's first year as an RA.

Residence hall assistant takes on role of parent, friend

Summer Brown, junior in elementary education, walks down a hallway in West Hall on Wednesday night, looking for open doors and broken lights. She's on rounds.

Rounds are one of the many requirements Brown has as a resident assistant for the fourth-floor A-wing in West Hall.

Once a week, Brown goes on her rounds, when she is the staff person in her hall who is called to address any emergency or other situation during her assigned time.

Brown must walk through the entire building twice a night looking for anything that needs to be fixed or someone who might want to talk.

One of Brown's biggest priorities this semester is conflict management. Brown said she thought she would have trouble being an enforcer and still being a friend.

"Sometimes, I don't think they take me as seriously because I'm their friend," Brown said. "Other times, it's easier because I am their friend."

Brown said she hasn't had to deal with a lot of confrontation, but people often look to her for advice.

Ellee Odgers, freshman in family and consumer sciences and Ford Hall resident, said her RA has been a great support this semester.

"My roommate and I were having some problems, and she was there for us both and helped us communicate," Odgers said. "She didn't take sides."

Brown said most of her residents are freshmen, and they're still learning what college is about. She said she wants her lifestyle to help her residents have a positive outlook. Brown said she doesn't do a lot of the typical things other college students might do.

"I don't drink and party," Brown said. "I don't have a boyfriend, and I'm cool with it. So my residents find someone that doesn't necessarily fit the image and it's OK."

There are other issues Brown handles such as diversity, suicide and eating disorders.

She said eating disorders are a big concern. Brown has to look for signs that one of her residents might be having problems, such as overuse of the Chester E. Peters Recreation Center.

"Statistics say that one out of four women will have an eating disorder," Brown said. "You need to know if they're going to the rec all the time because they want to or because they have a bad self-image."

Brown is at her job 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

"We're supposed to always be assessing the needs of our residents, so I am responsible to be here enough so that the residents know me," Brown said. "With meetings and friends, sometimes they have to come here, so I'm around."

Teresa O'Brien, senior in anthropology and former RA, said she thought it's important to prioritize in a job like this. She said RAs must take care of what is important to them but also take care of their residents.

Academic intervention has become a big part of Brown's job. RAs must keep track of their residents' academic standings and help them when problems arise.

"I actually have a really good floor," Brown said. "I've totally been blessed because they're pretty self-motivated, and they're here to go to school." Erin Connell, freshman in apparel design, said her RA took her to find all her classes at the beginning of the semester.

Connell said she was sick at the beginning of the semester and missed a lot of her classes, but her RA was there to make sure everything was going OK and to help work out any problems she was having.

Brown said there are many ways to keep up-to-date with her residents and their classes.

"I have a 'Grade-A' board, and they come and tell me when they get an 'A' on quizzes and stuff, and that's a continual way that I get to hear how their classes are going," Brown said.

Brown said being an RA is something that will give her a lot of great skills for life. She said the actual training she went through to be an RA was good in some aspects but going through the different situations is the real training.

"The situations are so different that you're not going to do the same thing over and over again," Brown said. "You're not going to know what that person needs beforehand. The hardest part is accepting that you've done all you can do, and it's up to them now."

Kendall accuses Starr of misconduct during Clinton investigation

By DAVID ESPO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — In the climax to a historic impeachment hearing, Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr heatedly defended his investigation under insistent questioning Thursday night from President Clinton's private attorney. Clinton's own conduct was scarcely mentioned.

"That is false and you know that it is false," Starr snapped at one point in the nationally televised House Judiciary Committee hearing as attorney David Kendall accused him of prosecutorial misconduct in his dealing with Monica Lewinsky.

"I am confident that we have abided by our obligations," Starr said as his adversary pressed him at another point on leaks of grand jury material.

Kendall set the tone right from his introduction: "Let me begin with the simple but powerful truth that nothing in this overkill of investigation amounts to a justification for the impeachment of the president of the United States."

The Clinton lawyer's pointed interrogation followed a full day of testimony by Starr in which lawmakers mixed questions with pointed statements laying out their parties' positions in the impeachment debate.

Starr said he wasn't present as an advocate for the report he had presented to Congress, although he referred to the president's perjury and obstruction of justice in connection with his affair with Lewinsky and long effort to conceal the

6 K-State seniors nominated for Truman, Marshall honors

By LYNETTE ABITZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Six K-State scholars soon might receive national notoriety. These students are the candidates for both the Truman and Marshall scholarships.

Rob MacDougall, senior in social work and political science; Lorenza Lockett, senior in social work; Emily Morrison, senior in psychology and leadership studies; and Grant Denny, senior in speech communication and political science, are nominees for the Truman Scholarship.

Tim Riemann, senior in agricultural economics; and Sam Halabi, senior in political science and natural resources and environmental science, are candidates for the Marshall Scholarship.

Beth Powers, scholarship adviser, said the Truman Scholarship provides $3,000 for a student's senior year of college and $27,000 for graduate school. The application includes 15 parts, including a public-policy analysis.

"It's designed toward students who have made some sort of progress in public service and who show great promise in the area," Powers said.

She said the Truman Foundation also is looking for students who would be

Mystery donor, dollar amount will be revealed after break

By RUSSELL FORTMEYER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock is expected to announce after Thanksgiving break that a substantial gift has been given toward Hale library's acquisitions budget, among other things.

The gift — said to be in the million-dollar range — is seen by many involved in the library as a step closer to establishing a $10-million endowment that could be used to pay for rising journal subscription costs. No one will confirm the identity of the donor, but he is an alumnus of K-State.

Hobrock revealed the existence of the gift at last Tuesday's University Library Committee meeting. He did not, however, discuss the specifics of dollar amount or donor identity. Hobrock said he had expected to announce the gift today. "The strategy has been changed to get a little more impact out of it," Hobrock said. "We will be delayed a couple of weeks."

It has not yet been determined just how the gift will be split up for the library's use. For instance, the gift also could help pay for the $800,000 outstanding construction debt remaining from the almost $30-million library project. All contracts for the library construction were paid, so the outstanding debt remains only on the Foundation's books.

Gary Hellebust, president of the Foundation and a leading figure in the library funding discussions, was unavailable for comment. David Weaver, vice president for real estate and investments at the Foundation, said

Expansion underway at football stadium

Since one of the goal posts was torn down at KSU Stadium and carried to Aggieville last weekend, the demolition has not stopped.

"If you have walked by the stadium, you can see that they have started tearing down the concession stands," said Kent Brown, Sports Information director.

The first phase of expansion will continue as long as the weather holds up.

"The first phase of the project is going on now. The east side of the stadium is currently being torn down," said Max Urlick, director of the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics. "They are doing the site-grading and erecting steel up before the winter hits."

The stadium expansion is financed by selling $15 million in bonds in $5,000 increments. The bonds are like those sold to companies and will be paid back with interest. The ones used for the expansion are government-sold entities.

"The entire project will cost $13.3 million; $12.8 million of it will be paid for using the money from the selling of the bonds," Keith Ratzloff, university controller, said. "The rest of the money will go to pay off the interest on the bonds that were issued."

All of the work going on is ahead of schedule, and the completed expansion is to be done before K-State's first home game of the 1999 season.

"They are working on a tight schedule, and as long as the weather permits, they'll be out there working," Brown said, "and that schedule they are working on hasn't started yet."

The actual deconstruction and other work on the bleachers will have to wait until after this weekend, when the state championships for 5A and 6A high school football will be played.

"After the high school games this weekend, they will start removing the upper bleachers," Brown said.

Urlick said despite budget limits, he's looking forward to the larger stadium.

"I'm very excited about the expansion," Urlick said. "We weren't able to do some things due to budget limitations, but we are replacing most of the east side and making some code adjustments. There's going to be a dramatic change to the stadium."

Crews work to clean water after oil spill

TULSA, Okla. — An oil spill on the Verdigris River from a Kansas refinery's pipeline prompted the closing of Nowata schools Thursday and led Tulsa to shut down water intake from a north-east Oklahoma lake as a precaution.

Crews were working around the clock to remove oil that leaked from a cracked Farmland Refinery pipeline and reached Oologah Lake 25 miles downstream.

They used giant vacuums to draw oil from the water.

"They say there is a very light sheen on the lake itself, but winds are keeping it to the west bank," said Michael Dean, spokesman for the Oklahoma Department of Environmental Quality.

About 32,000 gallons of light crude oil spilled into the river late Tuesday when a pipeline connecting an oil tank and the refinery in Coffeyville, Kan., began leaking. In response, 10 containment booms were set up downstream to trap the oil.

The city of Tulsa, which receives some drinking water from Oologah Lake, turned off its intake as a safety measure. The city has enough water in its reservoir to last 30 days, said Kim MacLeod, Tulsa Public Works Department spokeswoman.

"We are monitoring, and we are taking samples at the lake," she said.

Nowata, which draws water from the river for 4,000 city residents, also shut down its intake Wednesday as a preventive step.

Farmland hired trucks to ship water from nearby Bartlesville to maintain water service.

Nowata schools and the town's three car washes closed Thursday to conserve water.

David Barry, a spokesman for the federal Environmental Protection Agency in Dallas, said the recovery of oil had been hindered at times by debris from recent flooding and high water levels.

"Driftwood, whole trees, tires, are complicating recovery efforts," he said. "Some of the crude is actually getting by the booms."

Barry said it could take days to complete the recovery process and then begin the actual cleanup. The extent of environmental damage cannot be assessed until then.

"We can't really determine what is required until the water has receded some," he said.

Farmland, a Kansas City, Mo.-based company which has operated the Coffeyville refinery since 1944, pledged to be relentless in its efforts to contain and clean up the spill.

"We are going to do the right thing to minimize the impact of this accident on the environment and the communities along the Verdigris River," said Coleman Ferguson, Farmland's general manager of refining.

An initial investigation found a crack in a pipeline about 250 feet from the river. Farmland officials said they plan a full investigation to determine what caused the break.

Washburn will remain at smaller school level

TOPEKA — Washburn University has no desire to compete with Kansas' two large research universities, President Jerry Farley told a legislative committee Thursday.

"We don't want to be a 20,000-student institution. We don't want to grow beyond our capacity and lose our uniqueness," Farley said in outlining his vision for Washburn in the 21st century.

With the University of Kansas 25 miles to the east and K-State 60 miles to the west, Farley said, Washburn must carve its own niche as a smaller university with a quality campus environment and quality programs in order to attract more full-time students.

"We probably can grow from the 6,100, 6,200 or 6,300 student level now to about 7,000 students. That is our basic goal, about 7,000 students," Farley told the Legislative Educational Planning Committee during a Statehouse meeting.

He said Washburn is well-equipped to handle 7,000 students with its present physical plant and still maintain one of its strengths, small classes and low student-faculty ratio.

The biggest reason for Washburn remaining at this level, Farley said, is the fact Topeka has not grown appreciably and the capital city isn't likely to expand dramatically in the foreseeable future.

"We know the student population won't change much. We think we can continue to do a good job serving that population," said Farley, who came to Washburn from the University of Oklahoma a year and a half ago.

If the student demographics don't change, the nation's only remaining municipal university should grow comfortably to an enrollment of 7,000, he said.

"It's not as if we're going out and recruiting a lot of students," Farley said. "The students we want are the ones we can serve and who are comfortable with us. For some students, this is the best place for them."

That doesn't mean Washburn can't improve its exposure to Kansas high school graduates. Farley said he was surprised when he took over as president that more Kansans knew about Pittsburg State in the far southeast corner of the state than knew about Washburn.

DB92 selects director

By JENNI LATZKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The new program director for KSDB-FM 91.9 was chosen Thursday night by the advisory board of DB92. Jeremy Claeys, junior in electronic journalism and political science, will be the station's first program director. Claeys' job officially begins Jan. 11.

"I was very pleased that we had extremely qualified people apply for a brand new position," said David MacFarland, chairman of the advisory board.

"People were sincerely interested in seeing the station continue in its upward direction. The decision was not an easy one, because we had good people."

Claeys' duties will include overseeing programming, serving as chairman of KSDB executive staff, conducting weekly executive staff meetings and attending advisory board meetings.

He also will be responsible for hiring the rest of the executive staff, with assistance from general manager Candy Walton.

"The station has promise and can be a competitive force in the community," Claeys said.

He said he wants to establish a continuity for the station with a format listeners can rely on.

He also said he wants to gather people who are willing to do the work. Claeys said he plans on visiting campus organizations and living groups and asking them what they want to hear from the station as well.

"I want to base the programming primarily on what the students want to hear," Claeys said.

Claeys previously served as the news and public affairs director for the station.

Applications for executive staff positions still are available and can be picked up in Kedzie 105. Applications are due at 5 p.m., Nov. 23.

K-State students teach prevention to children through word games

By LYNETTE ABITZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Little fingers pushed pencils rapidly as they whizzed through the word find. Smiles crossed the children's faces as they received Snickers as rewards. K-State students encouraged the youngsters as they received the messages on safety, peer pressure and drugs.

The word game was one part of K-State's National United Law Enforcement Officers Association's visit to the Manhattan Boys and Girls Club

Inc. on Thursday evening.

Members led the children through a word find that featured phrases such as: "Say no to drugs," "Gangs are no good," "Stay out of trouble" and "Dial 911 for an emergency." They also led a tournament of Pictionary where the children tried to draw gangs, guns and other violence prevention messages.

Susan Williams, adviser of NULEOA, said the idea of the project was to prevent violence through role-modeling.

"One of the reasons we settled on this project was because it was worthwhile to the community and worthwhile to our study of crime," she said.

Williams said sending young children the message that violence is bad is a key preventative measure.

Andrea Zeiber, sophomore in criminology and anthropology, organized the event and said the event was planned in part to get the club's name into the community. She said it also was for the children.

"We wanted to do something interactive and fun for the kids that was about safety, peer pressure and kids," she said. Club members said they enjoyed their time with the children.

"The kids were so cute and had so much energy," Sara Eslinger, senior in sociology, said. "Programs like this are really good."

Brian Little, junior in sociology, also said he enjoyed the time and hoped it was worthwhile.

"We were only here for an hour, but maybe we made a difference," he said.

Lori Klein, senior in sociology, said she was impressed by the Boys and Girls Club program.

"The more people who get over here, the more it can expand," she said.

Williams said other activities NULEOA has planned include seminars on careers in criminology and a criminology career fair in the spring. The club also donated money to the Kevin Easter Scholarship and is establishing another scholarship for a graduate in criminology.

Manhattan Boys and Girls Club works with children ages 6 to 18 and is open from 3 to 8 p.m.

The Kansas State Collegian reaches 30,000 readers daily and more than 96 percent of the campus community reads the Collegian each week, with 85 percent reading the paper three times a week. Only 24 percent reads the Manhattan Mercury regularly.

The Collegian meets advertisers' needs with competitive pricing, a target audience and attention-getting graphics. When you place a classified display ad, you can choose from more than 50 categories, making sure you reach the customers you want. Ninety percent of the K-State population reads the classified section at least once a week. And one-third of the campus community named classified ads as the part of the Collegian they read most often. The most read classified sections are employment, apartments and items for sale.

Renters most often choose newspaper classified advertising as their No. 1 resource in apartment searching. Advertising in the Collegian reaches students trying to find a home away from home, as well as faculty and staff in the market to buy homes.

OUR VIEW

Community deserves proper considerations

Wal-Mart. America's finest example of the run-amok consumerism of the 20th century.

It is the only store that could team up with McDonald's and be on equal footing.

Manhattan is one of the few cities that was targeted by the corporation early on, when Wal-Marts only were around 250 in number. Our Wal-Mart was put together at a time when Sam Walton still was running the company, before mogul David Glass took over in the late 1980s. Since that time, however, the company hasn't paid much attention to Manhattan.

Now, the possibility of purchasing land on the west side of town at the intersection of Fort Riley Blvd. and Seth Child Road has reawakened the dormant giant's interest in Manhattan. Wal-Mart wants to build a Wal-Mart Supercenter on the land and take up 22 acres of space to do it.

Just think — 22 acres of shining, open-24-hours, concrete parking lots, litter and automobiles, at the center of which sits a gargantuan Wal-Mart. You could buy anything your heart desires here; the selection is endless — it's enough to rival the other Wal-Mart on the other side of town.

Unless things change, Wal-Mart is planning on opening the new Supercenter with its predecessor still operating on the east side.

The interesting thing about communities like Manhattan is that they tend to operate on a zero-sum-gain principle. In other words, the number of consumers in Manhattan and the surrounding area is relatively static. It doesn't really change that much, and it is unlikely many people will travel out of their way to come to Manhattan simply because we have a Wal-Mart Supercenter — unless corporate officials can convince the Kansas Transportation Authority to advertise the for Wal-Mart on Interstate 70 on a sign with the livestock judging team and the debate team.

We basically will have the same amount of money in this town, which means that in order to support a Wal-Mart Supercenter, something else will have to go. One of those things, if Wal-Mart wants to make its building plans worthwhile, probably will need to be the other Wal-Mart.

Some small businesses also probably will suffer. If a Wal-Mart Supercenter can offer more one-stop shopping than other Manhattan merchants, then some of those merchants will go under, plain and simple. Whether that will be good for consumers remains to be seen, but there is something to be said for promoting local businesses.

There are still several obstacles to overcome before Wal-Mart can get cozy. As the zoning now stands, 13 acres have been designated residential, while only nine have been designated commercial. Although the land has prime commercial acreage with its frontage along Seth Child and Fort Riley Blvd., it also is encompassed by other residential areas.

Wal-Mart corporate officers have plans to change the zoning laws, but the residents in that area justifiably would rather Wal-Mart simply disappear. They are worried about the added activity and noise in their quiet neighborhood. They are worried about the destruction of all of those acres of woodlands. They are worried about traffic, trash and safety. After all, Wal-Mart Supercenters are open 24 hours. What sort of customers are going to be in Wal-Mart at 3 a.m.? If you were the parent of a small child, would you want the traffic and the unfamiliar people?

Much of this, of course, is the typical "not in my backyard" mentality. We find it difficult to fault these people for that, though — they are entitled to their peace. We would urge Wal-Mart to reconsider some of its plans that would affect the neighborhood negatively. For instance, plans call for an exit from the parking lot to run directly into a residential neighborhood, increasing traffic and putting the safety of neighborhood children in jeopardy. We would suggest that Wal-Mart consider having exits on Fort Riley Blvd. and Seth Child only.

Additionally, it might be beneficial for the neighborhood if Wal-Mart attempts to conceal its presence, either with a barrier wall or with street trees. Preliminary outlines indicate that trees are not on Wal-Mart's agenda.

Maybe they should be. After all, if Wal-Mart wants to take over Manhattan, at least it could do so nicely.

AMERICA — LAND OF THE FREE?

Maybe it is time to instead become Land of Change

I was happy to learn voter turnout in the last election was 34 percent. People just don't want to take the time to vote, don't care or don't know.

What were we fighting for again?

After watching Cornel West and others speak on this subject for an hour on C-Span and seeing him on countless other shows such as "Politically Incorrect With Bill Maher," I came to the conclusion that we are a lot alike. Fluff out my hair, knock out a tooth, lose the religious affiliation, but keep the tolerance and that's me.

Oh yeah, I guess I'm not at Harvard, nor do I have a law degree.

But his book, "The Future of American Progressivism: An Initiative for Political Economic Reform," co-authored by Roberto Mangabeira Unger, outlines a philosophy detailing what is wrong with America and some suggestions for improvement. West is adamant about the fact that his way is not the right way. The right way is to have a national public discussion to see what way is.

The meeting is at 8 tonight, my place. Casual dress. Drinks provided.

This idea of change might come as a shock to some people who believe that America is the best nation. What is our superiority based on? Crime, corruption and poverty levels that are high and freedoms that are limited.

Don King couldn't have promoted us to a more gigantified, fantasmonious reputation.

Our reputation is preceding us, as both Willie the Wildcat and America suffer from gigantic-head syndrome. We believe we are the best nation, the world's peace keeper and a true world leader.

Those assumptions might be half right.

But it's not us, it's not you and me. It is those in Washington, D.C., who have the reputation. This country was founded to get rid of the figurehead position, by creating 537 national figureheads as well as a plethora in the state and local levels today.

This doesn't affect us in Manhattan, but rather it affects us as Americans.

Democracy might have been the answer then, but our founding fathers failed in one respect. I will not blame them for not being able to predict the future. In their time, the big thing was state's rights, which is what the Constitution was written for.

VIEWPOINT

TODD PACEY

New animals have reared their ugly heads.

Republicans. Democrats. NRA. Christian Coalition. Ken Starr. You name it. The country is run by special-interest groups. Today, the only state issues are those that get attached as riders.

An example would be attaching a clause giving $1 million to improve college football rankings in Los Angeles to a bill concerning the environment. As John Cleese would say, "And now for something completely different."

Maybe it is time for a change, but America is too proud to admit defeat. Face it, we have done some things well and have made a lot of improvements, but there still is something vitally wrong.

The government is too powerful to overthrow; they prepared for that. Something must be done, but what? The only viable solution is as West said: to have a public discussion.

Don't you just love it when you end where you began?

This has been part one of the ramblings of a progressive-anarcho-communistic-liberal-libertarian redhead.

Day in life of columnist should sound familiar to any student

Contrary to popular belief, columnists — at least this one — lead relatively normal lives. I mean, I put my pants on one leg at a time, just like everyone else. However, it seems some people think otherwise; they think that I see inspiration everywhere, that I lead a life of adventure in pursuit of my next story. Well, to placate these silly notions, I'll let you follow me around to catch a glimpse of an ordinary day in a columnist's life.

8 a.m. — Alarm sounds, hit snooze button.

8:10 a.m. — Alarm sounds, hit snooze button.

8:20 a.m. — Alarm sounds, hit snooze button.

8:30 a.m. — Alarm sounds, hit snooze button.

8:40 a.m. — Alarm sounds, hit snooze button.

8:50 a.m. — Alarm sounds, hit snooze button.

9 a.m. — Finally get up, get dressed and stumble toward 9:30 a.m. class.

9:01 a.m. — Realize my roommate tied a rope to my doorknob and the bathroom doorknob, effectively locking me in.

9:05 a.m. — Climb out bedroom window, hop onto garage roof, leap off top of garage and NOW stumble towards my 9:30 class.

9:16 a.m. — Arrive at 9:30 class, prepare for fifty minutes of boredom.

9:30 a.m. — Class starts.

9:34 a.m. — Become disinterested, start crossword in the Collegian.

10:20 a.m. — Emerge from class yawning and bleary eyed. Head toward 10:30 class.

10:29 a.m. — Get to class, climb over 17 people to get to last chair, which is in the middle of the row.

10:30 a.m. — Class starts.

10:33 a.m. — Become disinterested, finish crossword puzzle.

11:20 a.m. — Freedom! Start heading home.

11:24 a.m. — Almost get hit by an insane cyclist on sidewalk.

11:26 a.m. — Almost get hit by insane motorist on crosswalk.

11:31 a.m. — Arrive at home, push my way through throng of autograph seekers to front door.

11:32 a.m. — Realize that I forgot my keys.

11:34 a.m. — Climb back in through bedroom window. Realize my door still is tied shut.

11:37 a.m. — Go back outside and sign autographs until roommates come home.

12:54 p.m. — Roommates still not home. Decide to eat healthy lunch of roots and grubs.

1:28 p.m. — First roommate arrives, also forgot his keys.

1:31 p.m. — Second roommate arrives, unlocks door. Receives brutal beating for tying my door shut.

1:39 p.m. — A healthy dose of the Cartoon Network.

2:56 p.m. — Start brain-storming for next week's column.

3:00 p.m. — Give up. Roommate No. 1 proposes challenge of Nascar on PlayStation.

3:12 p.m. — Destroy him. A sizable amount of trash-talking ensues.

3:13 p.m. — Same roommate challenges you to a game of chess.

3:15 p.m. — Get destroyed. A sizable amount of trash-talking ensues.

3:16 p.m. — Flip the chess board over on him. Go back to watching Cartoon Network.

5:30 p.m. — Dinner, ramen noodles. Yummy.

6 p.m. — Decide to start studying.

6:01 p.m. — Decide to quit studying, go to Aggieville instead.

8 p.m. — Get home, resume studying.

8:08 p.m. — Fling books across room, accidentally hitting roommate, knocking him out.

8:09 p.m. — Apologize, doubt he heard me. He's unconscious. Leave him a note.

8:13 p.m. — While he's unconscious, retaliate for door incident earlier by hog-tying him and placing him on front lawn.

8:19 p.m. — A group of inebriated students steal your roommate.

8:21 p.m. — Wonder if this would make a good column. Decide against it. Resume watching Cartoon Network.

11:21 p.m. — Students throw roommate back on lawn. He's naked and covered in graffiti.

11:43 p.m. — Help roommate inside. Silently laugh.

12 a.m. — Shower and then go to bed for a good night's sleep so I can get up early and roadtrip to Missouri.

Purple pride flowed freely following Saturday's big win

Nov. 14, 1998 will live in my memories forever. Not because K-State beat Nebraska, subsequently causing hell to freeze over.

Not because I watched in dismay as it took our student body 33 minutes to complete a task as simple as tearing down a goal post.

I will remember this day because, while watching the most enthusiastic crowd ever to occupy Wagner Field, I realized just how much I love this school.

I know, it sounds disgustingly mushy, but how could I stand on the sidelines and watch as almost 45,000 people, all dressed in or painted purple, cheered on our No. 1-ranked football team without getting a little sentimental?

I have been a part of many groups and organizations, but my loyalty and dedication never has run as deep as it does for K-State. Seeing the amazing amount of spirit and enthusiasm in our student body made me more proud than ever to be a Wildcat.

I applaud the students from 6th floor Goodnow who painted their entire bodies purple and waited in line for almost five hours just to be on the front row during the game.

I applaud the tailgaters who flew Powercat flags and fed not only those folks who came with them but any other K-State fan who walked by.

I applaud everyone in the student section for making more noise with fewer people than I heard from the KU student section in Lawrence.

It is fans and students like these that make K-State a great place to get an education. Without them, our university would be reduced to nothing more than Baylor in purple.

Before the game, a friend of mine from high school and I were standing on the sidelines, watching the student section cheer and dance to the music on the P.A. He started talking about how amazing it was to be a part of a university that is in the national spotlight.

He is right. How many of you had any idea that when you chose to attend K-State, you would be seeing our school on ESPN "College GameDay?" I bet the thought of beating our archrival in football never crossed your mind, and I know I would have never expected to have the chance to cheer on my team in the national championship.

Every student at this university will have stories to tell their grandkids about the 1998 K-State football team. Those who have been here for a few years can say they witnessed firsthand the turnaround of the century.

The success of our football team isn't the only reason we should be proud of our school.

K-State also is home to two of the top college publications in the nation, and we have more academic award winners than any other public university in the country. Our debate and forensics teams continue to be successful, and our cross country team recently won the first Big 12 Conference championship in school history.

All these reasons add up to make K-State one of the best colleges in the nation to attend.

That makes my blood run an even deeper shade of purple.

Column should offend all women on campus

Editor,

I am a feminist. Therefore, as far as cultural logic and lore goes, I possess no sense of humor that I'm aware of (kind of like the FBI).

It should come as no shock, then, that I found Nov. 13 column entitled "Columnist's Drugs Would Make Women Bend to His Every Whim," by Michael Neff, completely void of anything approaching humor. If I hadn't had that "humor" performed by my radical sisters at feminazi headquarters, I would be rolling on the ground about now, holding my aching sides and pleading with Neff, "Stop, stop, you're killin' me!" At least, that's the way he and his like-thinkers will rationalize the rest of this response.

The real reason I'm not laughing is simple: your column, Neff, wasn't funny. All the disclaimers in the world, all the "it's all in good fun" statements won't change this basic fact.

I can't laugh at your Pygmalion suggestions, your prescriptions for the creation of the ideal woman for two reasons: first, your literary talents and/or your satiric insights were not up to the task you undertook, and second, your "humor" helps create and maintain a system in which I really do cry: "Stop, stop, you're killing me." Because I have no desire to degrade you publicly on point No. 1 (a courtesy you could have paid me and all the other women who read the Collegian by not writing that column in the first place), the rest of my response will focus on point No. 2.

One of the core functions of humor is to diminish — to diminish anxiety, to diminish fear, to diminish sanctimony and hypocrisy. This diminishment of emotions is a vital part of any society; simply, humor helps us cope with the pain of being human, the pain inherent in existence. This law of diminishment also holds true when humor is based on stereotypes — sexist, racist, or homophobic stereotypes, for example. But, this sort of "humor" doesn't diminish emotion. Instead, it diminishes the individuals themselves who are the targets of the humor — their humanity, their pride, their right to bodily integrity.

Your column, Neff, diminished me, it diminished my society's response to my concerns, it made me a laughing-stock and relegated me to caricature status. You did this to me, Neff — a living, breathing human being, not some amorphous mass that so often serves as the patriarchal punch line. Not only did you do this to me, you also did it to all the women who exist in your life, to women with titles like mother, friend, lover, sister. Your column calls up the worst stereotypes that exist about us as women — that we're petty, whiny, bitchy, frigid, and stupid — and then "laughingly" suggests that the cure for all of these "ills" is a pill that would make us silent and inert, passive and pliable.

If I point out to you that such "humor" helps create and legitimize a world in which my degradation is viewed as sport, that it sends a message to some that hurting me is not as serious as hurting you. If I do cry, "Just stop it, you're killing me," you respond with a shake of your head and a roll of your eyes and say under your breath, "Geez, lighten up. I told you I was just joking. Stop being so politically correct." What I deserve is your apology. What I get is your condescension and contempt.

I wonder, Neff, if you would have ever thought to write such a column with the worst of racist stereotypes as the foundation of the "humor," a column entitled "Columnist's Drugs Would Make African-American Men Bend to the Whim of Anglo Guys," for example. Chances are no, because I'm assuming you are at least intelligent enough to realize that the larger society would be outraged if you did so — and rightly outraged at that. Even if you lacked the insight to see how offensive and wrong this would be, the editors of the Collegian would never run such a column. Lucky for you, when the target of the "humor" is women (and this means women of all races, ages, and sexualities), anything goes.

As I debated whether I would respond to your column, whether I would allow myself to be baited by your obvious attempt at "riling the women up," I realized that I had little choice but to do so. You see, your "humor" is dangerous, and this needs to be pointed out to you. As long as someone can suggest — in print — that what is needed are drugs that render women incapable of saying "No" (by the way, there are such drugs available; they're called "roofies" or "the date rape drug"), and then cover such horrific assertions with an umbrella labeled "Just Joking," the overall diminishment of women will continue, and our pleas to "just stop" will keep falling on deaf ears.

I challenge you or anyone else, Neff, to find the humor in that.

Facilities workers should be thanked

Editor,

We often read letters in the Collegian regarding the negative aspects of situations involving the actions by K-State and the city of Manhattan. In order for landscape enhancement, the repair and upgrade of subterranean services and automobile transportation, we occasionally are inconvenienced.

This temporary inconvenience usually is a small price to pay to avoid significant breakdowns and repair needs in the future if these jobs are not done in an orderly and timely fashion. We often fail to give recognition and support to the many positives that abound for all, both at K-State and in the city of Manhattan.

As a former student and longtime K-State Alumni Association member, I am impressed with the appearance of the campus, the beautiful setting and unique buildings. The campus never has looked better in my remembrance.

Although architectural excellence and aesthetically pleasing lines are not present in all of our buildings, there are many remarkable and attractive buildings on this campus. Some have great historical significance and excellent architectural features; recently constructed buildings also have enduring characteristics that appeal to a diverse group of K-State family members. We are fortunate to have such a beautifully landscaped and well-maintained campus at a time when the university has undergone some marked budget limitations.

The maintenance, enhancement and beauty of this campus is, in large part, due to skilled and dedicated university employees. These employees include painters, groundskeepers, arborists, janitorial staff, sheet-metal workers, concrete workers, horticulturalists and other specialists too numerous to mention. Many of these employees have dedicated their entire work lives to K-State and have a dedication and work ethic that extends far beyond 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. each workday. To maintain the antiquated systems and structural integrity of many of our old campus buildings requires skill, craftsmanship and knowledge not available in workers trained only with computers and automation.

I am acquainted with many employees in the metal shop and continually am amazed with their skill in design and construction of pieces to repair the needs of this campus and to construct new enhancements. It is common to see the arborists starting to prune trees at 6 a.m.

Workers clearing sidewalks after a snowstorm start long before sunrise. Many employees work through the night so we will not be inconvenienced during the day.

The whole Division of Facilities team should be applauded and thanked for its tremendous collective skill, dedication and effort. These men and women have pride in their work, and their dedication needs to be recognized by all persons associated with K-State.

Ahearn Field House should be used more

Editor,

We are two concerned students. We only can imagine the possibilities that Ahearn Field House has in store for any college sport. We have attended the past few home volleyball games, and we honestly can say we are impressed by what went on there. Ahearn is a historical site on our campus, but it also has many special gifts to offer the community of Manhattan. Ahearn is a great location for the community and for the college campus. Ahearn also has a wonderful tradition of having special events, such as body building during Homecoming. Finally, the level of noise that builds up is what makes Ahearn so incredible.

We have come to question the reason why Ahearn isn't used more. We feel the basketball programs should have at least one game per season in Ahearn. Not only will this increase crowd attendance because of the location, but it also will add the crowd as being the sixth man to the Wildcats' teams. We hate to use the University of Kansas as an example, but if you have ever stepped foot in Allen Fieldhouse, you instantly can feel the intensity and fire that builds from historical places like this one. We too have a place like that here in Manhattan — Ahearn. Yet we don't use it to our advantage.

Once again, just think of the things that ultimately could result from having a game in Ahearn. The campus as a whole would get more involved because of the location and thus result in the team getting better fan support. Bobby Knight, coach of the Indiana Hoosiers said, "Ahearn Field House is the last place I would want to come back to." This statement from one of the best coaches in the game of basketball states exactly the potential that Ahearn has to offer. Let's play another game in Ahearn.

Neff's jokes lacked class, even humor

Editor,

Perhaps we should start by saying that anyone who is as ignorant as Michael Neff should "neatly fold this" and put it aside (and start paying attention to your classes, because you're obviously spending too much time reading your front-page football articles).

Before we begin, we'd like to add we hope your mother got to read your column in Friday's paper. We're sure your mother will be beaming with pride to know that you think of her as nothing more than a mindless, tampon-buying maid.

Considering the Collegian regarded "Columnist's drugs would make women bend to his every whim" appropriate for public consumption, we'd like to propose something to make you think.

We don't have a problem with Neff having opinions (however stupid we think they are), but when you choose to publish or consent to spreading such offensive propaganda, we think you, the Collegian, and you, Neff, should take the time to think about what you've really just said. To put it in another light, substitute "physically challenged," or "African-American," or "Baptist" for every reference to women in the article. Would an article be printed that said: "Slaveagra — taking this drug immediately would cause the user to have uncontrollable urges to cook for their white counterpart, wash dishes, dust, sweep, etc." We certainly would hope not. That is not acceptable. That would not be tolerated. This won't either.

We also thought it interesting that Neff chose to illustrate his points by referring to drugging someone as acceptable — pretty much saying that if there was a drug for those things, he'd gladly drug his "counterpart."

Authorities in the area can confirm that Rohypnol and GHB are serious problems on this campus. You wouldn't joke about drunk driving or murder, and those are much less likely to occur — but, nice touch.

So, we'd like to thank the Collegian for casting K-State in such a "classy" light on this important and highlighted weekend.

ON THE ROAD TO MISSOURI

Against the Tigers, the Wildcats are focused on

Defending the Glory

By JON BALMER

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One last hurdle remains between the K-State football team and a regular season of perfection, and clearing that last black-and-gold bar will not be easy.

With title-game aspirations still alive, the Cats (10-0, 7-0), ranked No. 1 in the USA Today/ESPN poll, rumble into Columbia, Mo., for a battle with Larry Smith's 19th-ranked Missouri Tigers (7-3, 5-2) Saturday at 2:30 p.m.

For the second-consecutive week, the Cats will be forced to defend their top ranking against an opponent that would consider a victory against K-State equal to a bowl victory.

In their first test as No. 1, the Cats defeated Nebraska 40-30 to end a 29-game losing streak to the Huskers. The victory wasn't secured until linebacker Jeff Kelly ran a Husker fumble in for a touchdown with three seconds remaining.

Although the stakes are high at Faurot Field on Saturday, Coach Bill Snyder said his team would enter the game with the right mentality.

"No one in our locker room or in our program does not understand what lies in front of them," he said.

While Snyder always has preached the value of taking the season one game at a time, many believe the Cats will suffer a Husker hangover after such an emotional victory last Saturday. However, Snyder said his players will be focused due to the magnitude of what a K-State victory would mean.

"Over their tenure, that's been our agenda," he said. "There's always something at stake. There's always something waiting on the horizon. That's the nature of our program."

No. 1 has proven to be a dangerous position in 1998; just ask Ohio State. The former-No. 1 Buckeyes fell from the throne two weeks ago after an upset by Michigan State. Last weekend, Tennessee, ranked No. 1 in the AP poll, survived a nail-biter against Arkansas.

Regardless of past victims, safety Milton Proctor said he was thrilled to be sitting on the top of college football world.

"It's such a great feeling to be in the position we are right now," Proctor said. "It's like 104 other teams wish they were here."

Proctor, a Missouri native, said he's looking forward to facing former high school opponents who now wear black and gold. Although the allure of staying in-state after high school was strong, Proctor said he was happy he chose K-State.

"We're undefeated and have the chance to play for a national championship," he said. "It's just a blessing to be a part of this team."

In order to close out a season of perfection, the Cats might have to establish a running game without senior Eric Hickson, who is recovering from a leg injury suffered during the Nebraska game. Snyder indicated the Cats might switch to a running-back-by-committee plan, interchanging David Allen, Marlon Charles and Frank Murphy in the backfield.

Another problem for the Cats will be stifling Mizzou's potent rushing attack, which features the nation's third-leading rusher, Devin West, and multi-skilled quarterback Corby Jones.

With two rushing threats, defensive end Joe Bob Clements said the Tigers are dangerous on offense despite their obvious agenda.

"It's going to be smash-mouth football at its finest," Clements said. "Missouri doesn't really hide what they're going to do. They're going to come downhill at us and try and knock us in the ground and drive us. It's going to be a very physical ballgame."

Jones poses a Michael Bishop-type problem for the defense. The senior quarterback has thrown for 1,032 yards and rushed for 482 and 10 touchdowns. While his similarity to Bishop makes him difficult to contain, Clements said it gives the defense an advantage, since they know Bishop's weapons so well.

"Not only do we go against Michael, but we see the problems he gives other teams," Clements said. "Corby Jones will be very similar, so we have to watch for the types of big plays he has the ability to make."

Finishing the season in hostile territory isn't the kind of scenario K-State wanted, but it provides the opportunity to prove their high ranking. While the opposing crowd noise will play a heavy factor in the contest, senior wide receiver Darnell McDonald said the outcome will be determined by the Cats' focus.

"Wherever you go, if you're not at home, it's going to be a lot harder to win," McDonald said. "Your fans aren't going to be behind you, and their fans are going to be in your ear, screaming at you."

"Going into another place we still have to be assignment sound, no turnovers and complete your assignment to win," he said.

The chance to become the first undefeated football team in K-State history arrives Saturday when the Cats attempt to build on their school record 18-game winning streak. All week, Missouri players have been providing K-State with locker room material, predicting an upset and arguing the Cats were overrated. McDonald welcomed the talk, adding that Saturday would prove actions speak louder than words.

"I feel good that they think they can beat us, so we can just go down there and prove them wrong," he said.

Bishop needs media to win Heisman

"Michael Bishop for the Heisman" debates have been heated this week after local and national writers from every walk of the sports world left KSU Stadium last Saturday in total disgust because they couldn't talk to the K-State MVP quarterback after his Nebraska mastery.

Adding to the writers' disgust was the fact that Bishop was allowed to do interviews with ESPN "College GameDay" and Sports Illustrated despite the news media blackout, which had been imposed by Bill Snyder for the previous five weeks.

Snyder, however, offered an apology Tuesday in his weekly press conference, saying, "I owe all of you and some other people an apology for a mistake I made in reference to Michael to visit with a national magazine and not allowing him to be present at the press conference after the ball game."

"I offer no excuses. It was a mistake on my part. I apologize to Michael, I apologize to you and I will apologize to other media who were here who didn't have the opportunities that I afforded one magazine."

Bishop then proceeded to field questions from a hungry group of reporters for about 25 minutes under Snyder's supervision.

Bishop was listed as second in the voting for this week's Heisman poll by ESPN, behind Texas' star running back Ricky Williams, and he still has two weeks to open the eyes of enough balloters to take the lead.

The Heisman trophy is supposed to be given to the best all-around college football player, and if that's the case, Bishop should have it locked up. Even considering all of Williams' numbers, which are so great that what he has done is almost incomprehensible, he is not the best all-around athlete. You'll never see Williams single-handedly carry Texas to a win against a good run defense; if you need proof, just pick up his stats after K-State shut down Williams on Sept. 19.

Bishop, on the other hand, single-handedly lead his team to a victory, engineering a come-from-behind fourth quarter against Nebraska. Though Bishop's numbers aren't as lofty as Williams, Snyder makes the point, "Those kind of awards are based on what a guy does for a season, or at least it's supposed to be. It's pretty obvious what he's meant to this football team over an extended period of time."

"It's supposed to be given to the best college football player, and Ricky Williams is a tremendous football player. I understand that, but when you talk about football players, you talk about a lot of dimensions, and to me, Michael has all of the dimensions. He can run it, he can throw it, he's involved in every snap, he's got great leadership ability, he's so competitive and these are things that everybody knows what he has meant to this football team," he said.

Snyder also posed the question, "We've got a lot of good players, and without taking anything away from everybody else — and it doesn't happen with one guy — but could it happen without that one guy?"

However strong the Wildcats play to promote Bishop for Heisman, it's all coming too little, too late. Bishop should have had this kind of backing four weeks ago to help bring more attention to him for the Nebraska matchup. You also have to wonder how readily the writers, nearly all of whom vote for the Heisman and who were shunned away from KSU Stadium, will accept Snyder's apology. At the local level, it seems the people who watch Bishop weekly still have bad sentiments lingering for not being able to speak with Bishop over the five-week period he was muzzled. That's pretty telling as to where the votes will be cast come December.

Now, I know the award is supposed to be given for what people accomplish on the field, but previous years have proven that's not really the case. If it were, Troy Davis would have been given the Heisman two years ago. The simple fact is, the Heisman really is a popularity contest as much as anything, and Bishop's popularity isn't all that high with the people who really matter.

17th-ranked Cats face conference foes

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State volleyball team, ranked No. 17 in the nation for the second week, returns to action tonight when the Cats travel to Lubbock, Texas, to play the 24th-ranked Texas Tech Red Raiders. K-State concludes its Texas trip Saturday night in Waco to take on the Baylor Bears.

With the 17-8 Wildcats heading into the final stretch and last road trip of the season, the team has set its sights on doing what it takes to get the first two rounds of the NCAA Tournament played in Manhattan, Dec. 3-5.

"Playing in front of our crowd is the greatest thing," Coach Jim McLaughlin said. "You can only play half of them at home. You have to be prepared on the road, especially in the Big 12 Conference."

McLaughlin said that while the last few matches are important ones, that doesn't take away from the matches already played this season.

"Every match has been very important to this team from day one," McLaughlin said, "and when you get to the end of the season it seems like they're more important, but all are important."

"I just feel like we have an opportunity to try to host. We're going to need to win to host. That's the bottom line."

Earlier this season in Manhattan, the Wildcats defeated Tech and Baylor with 3-0 sweeps. The Red Raiders will be the 10th top-25 opponent for the Cats this season. Baylor enters the action with a 14-15 record.

"I expect the Texas Tech match to be a very emotional match," McLaughlin said. "What I'm trying to get my team to think about is just playing the game and staying on their tactics and playing hard within the game plan. If we do that, we'll be all right."

"Baylor is playing better right now. You have to beat them. They won't give you anything, but if we remain focused, we'll be okay."

McLaughlin said playing in Lubbock might be hostile because of the strong Tech fan support.

"It's a hostile environment to play in, but it's one of those places that it's kind of fun to show how good you are in a tough, tough environment. We've been in front of some tough crowds and responded well," he said.

A piece of art work is displayed on the second floor of the K-State Student Union. The Union is planning to purchase various art to add to its collection.

UNION ART COLLECTION TO EXPAND

By RUSSELL FORTMEYER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

After a few years of lying dormant, the K-State Student Union has reentered the market for local art.

Already housing a large, diverse collection of work by students, faculty and professionals, the Union has organized an ad hoc committee — now in its infancy — with a mission to select art for the potential purchase and addition to its collection.

"If we have a successful fiscal year, we will possibly have more money to spend," Union Director Bernard Pitts said. "I think it should be clear that the Union holds a high value on showing art on its walls. Art communicates our history, and people have a pleasant experience being exposed to art indirectly."

The Union's commitment to displaying original art outside of a gallery setting is rare but not unheard of for university student unions. The Union's collection was larger, but some pieces have been taken down for repair and framing or simply were on loan.

When the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art began its process of moving from the KSU Foundation building to its new building on the southeast corner of campus, its staff began to coordinate the return of the campus art collection to the museum. For decades, the art collection was in a variety of campus offices and throughout the Union.

The Union returned 71 works of art to the art museum; the Union owns around 200 works. There are some themes in the collection, most notably an emphasis on local artists who, at one time or another, have been involved with K-State. Among them are Oscar Larmer, Judy Love, Jim Munce and the late John Helm, who organized the original K-State art collection that now is at the art museum.

Another intentional focus of the Union collection has been to develop themes in the second floor meeting rooms. Pitts said he has divided the second floor between showing Kansas artists in the east side rooms and keeping ethnic themes in the west side rooms. The rest of the building will show a variety of work, Pitts said.

Attention has been paid to the value of the art. Pitts said he makes sure more valuable pieces are hung either in rooms that are locked when not in use or in highly visible areas. Still, damage does occur.

A painting that hangs on the west wall of the Stateroom has a tear in the lower portion of the canvas and a variety of pencil and pen marks. Other paintings — not under glass — exhibit similar characteristics. As evidenced by the pile of art in the associate director's office, the Union staff is working to fix those problems.

Jack Connaughton, associate director of the Union, said it's a rarity for the art to be damaged.

"It speaks highly of our K-State student body as a whole," Connaughton said. "For the most part, we've been lucky."

The ad hoc committee, established under the auspices of the Union Governing Board, has yet to set its acquisitions goals.

However, Pitts said the committee generally has an "anything goes" collecting policy, whereby it can nominate works of art for purchase. He said most works probably will be from campus or regional art exhibitions.

Elizabeth Dodd, associate professor of English and member of the ad hoc committee, said no aesthetic guidelines have been set for the committee. However, she said she is anticipating the program's prospects.

"The Union is the physical structure that houses a continuation of the intellectual life of the campus," Dodd said. "It's wonderful to encourage the need to have and display art."

Japanese demon drummers invade McCain to educate

By CORBIN H. CRABLE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

This weekend, K-State will welcome its first troupe of demon drummers to Manhattan when Ondekoza, a Japanese group of taiko drummers, performs at 8 tonight in McCain Auditorium.

Ondekoza is Japanese for "demon drummers," and the group uses Japanese taiko drums, which range in weight from 20 to 700 pounds, in their music. The word "taiko" not only refers to the drums themselves but also is a Japanese percussion style.

Ondekoza, formed in 1969 by Tagayasu Den, was the first taiko group to bring the music to the stage.

Ondekoza became well-known in the United States when, in 1990, the group performed at Carnegie Hall.

During this time, the highly energized group ran the perimeter of the United States itself, an astonishing 9,500 miles, and performed in a total of 335 cities, wearing out 121 pairs of shoes.

The taiko music style has been in existence for more than 1,400 years and only has gained popularity in the past few decades, Richard Martin, director of McCain, said.

"Tagayasu Den put taiko drumming on the map, and he's been doing it since the 1950s and '60s," Martin said.

Martin said that with the energy of the music, audience members will be kept both entertained and enthusiastic.

"There certainly is much energy," he said. "They are able to generate a response in people that really carries an audience along."

Martin also said there is much to look for in the music of Ondekoza.

"There are various thematic elements treated in the works they will perform," he said. "The group is something of a cult; they are physical fitness enthusiasts."

Due to the varying weight of the drums, the drummers need to be at the peak of physical fitness, Martin said.

The performance also will educate audiences about the Japanese culture, he said.

"We're trying to present students with art forms they may know nothing about," Martin said.

"This is an ensemble that is highly recommended. It's a group that can thrill their audiences."

Ticket prices are $20 for the general public, $18 for patrons 65 and older, and $10 for students and children under the age of 18. For more information, call the McCain box office at 532-6428.

Wicked, dark comedy to be shown at Union

By M.A. LOROFF
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

The end-of-the-semester crunch can make some people feel like killing someone.

"Young Poisoner's Handbook," presented by Union Program Council's Kaleidoscope Film Committee, tells the story of Graham Young, who can give these people some advice.

The 14-year-old Young proves all it takes is a chemistry set and a devious little mind.

Young is the central character in a true-life story about a boy who lives in the 1960s in a London suburb.

"He's intelligent, but misunderstood. He also has a bad home life," Chris Heeley, Kaleidoscope chairman, said.

Because of this, Graham starts dabbling with chemistry and poison. He becomes obsessed with becoming the greatest poisoner the world has ever seen. To do this, he needs test subjects, so he volunteers his family and friends without telling them.

"He keeps detailed notes about the dosages and when he gives them the poison. He starts showing really psychotic behavior," Heeley said.

After people begin to get suspicious, Graham is sent to a high-security mental hospital for the criminally insane. Eight years later, Graham is paroled and sent back into society.

Once again in society, Graham gets a job at a camera store. Here, Graham has unlimited access to all the old poisons he used to use. The question is, can Graham resist the temptation?

"It probably should have been a film for Halloween," Heeley said. "It's a eerie film."

Heeley said the movie is a mixture of aspects.

"It's not really a horror show or a documentary," Heeley said. "It's a story through the eyes of a boy."

The film, directed by Benjamin Ross, is said to be one of the most wicked, smartest and nastiest dark comedies in years.

Battling the annual COLD WAR

Orange juice, zinc 2 home remedies suggested for cold, flu season

By DESIREE LAMBERSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sniffles, sneezes, flu bugs — whatever they're called, cold and flu season is here, and no one is safe from it.

From chicken soup and orange juice to zinc and cough syrup, people seem to have their own remedies for winter afflictions. However, some of them might not be anything more than a psychological remedy.

A cold commonly consists of minor symptoms, including congestion, mild sore throat and body aches. The flu has the same symptoms but are more extreme and include a fever, body aches and a severe cough.

One popular remedy is Vitamin C, found in orange juice and other food. However, Jeff Dunler, pharmacist at Lafene Health Center, said Vitamin C might not help fight off those winter colds.

"There is some information that it does possibly reduce the duration of a cold, but it has had mixed reviews," he said.

Cathie Barry, director of nursing at Lafene, said she agreed.

"Some people who take an extra large dose of Vitamin C do believe that it helps, but there are varying opinions," she said, "but it certainly won't hurt them to take it."

Zinc is another remedy that has become popular. Found in the form of a lozenge taken every two hours, zinc is believed by some people to be the new wonder pill for curing colds and the flu.

Barry said there was one study in which 40 percent of the subjects reported reduced symptoms and shorter duration; however, it also has had mixed reviews among the medical world.

"You have to suck on the lozenge every two hours, which may leave a metallic taste in the mouth, but some people say it helps," she said. "For some that may be useful, but I tried it myself and I didn't think it helped at all."

Barry said she thought sore throat, mild cough or congestion sufferers should try an over-the-counter medication.

Dunler said for the relief of a sore throat, he advised looking for something that contains menthol, benzocaine or phenol.

Dunler said an antihistamine might dry a runny nose but also might cause drowsiness.

A decongestant, meanwhile, will open the sinuses, relieving congestion, but will not stop a runny nose. A decongestant also might cause hyperactivity and, if taken close to bedtime, it might cause insomnia.

Barry said gargling with warm salt water or sucking on lozenges also might help

throats.

Dunler said he suggests taking ibuprofen for a sore throat because it reduces the body's inflammatory response.

For congestion, Barry said she suggests steam.

"Take a hot shower, or just stay in the bathroom while the shower is running," she said. "That steam really helps a lot to break up that congestion."

Barry also said she suggests plenty of rest, fluids and chicken soup.

"Chicken soup is a good idea," she said. "They do believe that there is an enzyme in it that is a protective element against colds."

Barry said prescription medications, such as Amantadine and Flumadine, might help with the flu. However, they must be given within the first 24-48 hours of the onset.

"Otherwise, it isn't very helpful, but it may help you improve," she said.

Barry said if symptoms worsen or don't improve, sufferers should see a doctor.

"If they have the flu and are treating it at home, they may still develop complications," she said. "If it's been four to five days and their fever is getting higher or other symptoms worsen, they should also come in and see a doctor."

Barry said if cold sufferers develop a fever or begin to cough up a yellow or green phlegm, they also might need additional treatment.

Barry said although everyone is at risk for getting sick, there are ways to reduce the chance.

"It's very difficult to avoid exposure — just be smart," she said.

"Wash your hands a lot, if you cough, cover your mouth," she said. "In a situation like college where you're in class and then someone sits next to you and coughs, or someone that was sick sat in that desk before you, you can physically get the germs on your hands and share them."

You know that there's more to Japan than Sony, sushi and sumo. But do you know about taikei? Ondekoza ("demon drummers") is one of the preeminent taikei ensembles. And this 17-member ensemble has thrilled audiences across the U.S. from Alaska to New York's Carnegie Hall.

Taikei refers both to the drums and to drumming as an art form. Dating back perhaps more than 1,000 years, taikei was used in both Buddhist and Shinto religious ceremonies. Since the 1960s, however, taikei has been performed by a mixed drum ensemble in a style that emphasizes speed, dexterity and power.

There is nothing compared to the live show, with the sounds and power building and building. You're a part of a magical, wonderful experience. The power surrounds you and draws you in. It's like being inside a thunderstorm. We were entirely "drum-struck" by Ondekoza, and Wow! I loved it! "Angel" / Rolling Thunder truth about it.

INQUIRY

In his first 45 minutes of questioning, Kendall did not ask Starr a single question about the evidence he found in his long and costly investigation — a probe that resulted in allegations of 11 separate examples of potentially impeachable offenses.

Instead, the president's lawyer peppered Starr with questions — cross-examination style — about his own conduct and that of the prosecutors, FBI agents and others who worked for him.

After a litany of allegations, Starr said, "It's time for some fairness with respect to all of these charges that keep getting bandied about."

Kendall's questions were a continuation of the day-long pattern in which Democratic members of the House Judiciary Committee sought to put the spotlight on Starr, whose evidence triggered the third impeachment inquiry in the nation's history.

The day began with Starr laying out the evidence he has gathered about Clinton and Lewinsky and accusing the president of conducting a "scheme to conceal."

Democrats soon launched a withering attack on Starr, who fielded question for hour after hour from a witness chair a few feet away from where the lawmakers sat.

Starr said the "plain language" of the Constitution makes clear that Clinton could be prosecuted for perjury after he leaves office, regardless of the outcome of the impeachment proceedings.

"I stand behind it because it is mine," he said of the report he submitted to the committee in September outlining grounds for possible impeachment arising from Clinton's sexual relationship with Lewinsky.

Even before Starr began to speak, Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., accused the former federal judge of having "crossed the line into obsession" with his four-year, $40-million investigation.

A second Democrat, Barney Frank of Massachusetts, asked why Starr had not told the public before the fall elections that he had found no evidence of impeachable offenses in inquiries into other areas covering FBI files, the dismissal of White House Travel Office employees and the Whitewater real estate deal in Arkansas.

When Starr responded that his mandate under the law was only to report on evidence of potentially impeachable offenses, Frank said, "In other words, you don't have anything to say unless you have something bad to say."

Questioning by Republicans was far more gentle, and several made clear their sympathy for Starr.

"I commend you for standing up to the nonsense ... that you have had to put up with today," said Rep. Bob Barr of Georgia, one of Clinton's most ardent critics.

Clinton was in Asia beginning a five-day visit when Starr stood before the committee's chairman, Rep. Henry Hyde, raised his right hand and swore the traditional witness' oath to tell the truth.

White House Press Secretary Joe Lockhart said Clinton did not watch any of the live coverage but saw one short clip of it on a CNN news broadcast. However, an aide did brief Clinton on Starr's prepared testimony, Lockhart said.

Behind panel members were two big portraits — one of Hyde, the Illinois Republican at the helm of the current inquiry; the other of former Rep. Peter Rodino, the Democrat who oversaw the Watergate impeachment proceedings against Richard Nixon in the same room in 1974.

Starr's testimony was the first the committee had taken since receiving boxes of his evidence this fall. While the full GOP-controlled House has voted for an open-ended inquiry, Republican appetite for prolonged proceedings has diminished markedly in the wake of election setbacks. Thus, it was not clear whether — or when — articles of impeachment ever would emerge from the panel.

Several sources, speaking on condition of anonymity, say Rep. Bob Livingston, R-La., who is in line to become House speaker in January, has said in private conversations he wants the issue resolved before he takes office.

Still, Hyde announced to the displeasure of Democrats that the committee would vote on issuing subpoenas to additional witnesses. Among them was Robert Bennett, the lawyer who represented Clinton in Paula Jones' sexual harassment case.

Peppered with questions about alleged inappropriate treatment of Lewinsky, grand jury leaks, his own private law clients and other matters, Starr had made only one concession as the hearing moved into the evening. He agreed to provide a list of clients from his former law firm.

At the same time, when Rep. Maxine Waters, D-Calif., asked him directly whether he felt he had a conflict of interest, he replied, "I did not."

He stoutly turned aside all suggestions of prosecutorial misconduct, although at several points he told his questioners they might well have a different view of the law.

"Obviously this body is at liberty to reject" the material as not being "substantial, credible evidence" of impeachable offenses, he said.

He said the president was at the heart of a pattern of obstruction that was inconsistent with his duty.

leaders in the area of public service.

Morrison said she is honored to be a candidate, and she thought the other candidates would be just as deserving to win it. She said it has been amazing to interact with her fellow candidates.

Morrison's public policy issue is to incorporate service learning into higher education. She received experience in this area when she interned with the K-State leadership program.

"I really enjoyed it," she said. "I think it would be beneficial to other classes."

al that is best for the area," Davis said.

Steve Zilkie, senior planner for the city, said although Wal-Mart has not made a formal proposal, it has had an agreement with the owner of the property and the city, which stated the land would not be rezoned until Wal-Mart submitted its proposal.

Nine of the 22 acres are zoned for commercial use.

al-Mart's proposal to the city will ask for changes in the single family zoning of the remaining 13 acres. Problems need to be resolved before a final proposal is made.

LIBRARY

Hellebust has been coordinating the specifics of the gift.

Hobrock said he has had no involvement with the donor but only has acted as a recipient. He said the Foundation deserves the credit for facilitating the gift.

Karen McCulloh, assistant to the dean of libraries and a member of the Friends of the Library, said the Friends group is taking a look at the gift to see if the group could enhance it with a monetary contribution. McCulloh said, however, it was too early to say just how that would play out.

While there is much going on behind the scenes for the library, the library committee set a new goal this week.

Committee members agreed to work toward upgrading Hale Library's status to that of an Association of Research Libraries institution.

"I feel optimistic that we can get the administration and the university to Morrison said she is considering a graduate degree in student personnel or student affairs and wants to work with students on college campuses.

Denny said the application process has been a learning experience. "Since it's public-service oriented, I'm glad I got to see how I compare to people who plan to pursue public-service careers," he said.

Denny's work as an intern with Common Cause in Washington, D.C., inspired him to choose campaign-finance reform for his public policy issue. He plans to get a graduate degree in public administration and possibly a law degree. He said he ultimately would like to work for a non-profit organization.

Lockett's issue focuses on the effects of welfare reform on child care. MacDougall's policy is equal insurance coverage for the mentally ill.

Powers said 80 Truman Scholars are selected nationwide, with usually one per state. She said candidates will be notified in mid-February if they have been selected for nationwide interviews.

Powers said she welcomes students who are interested in the scholarship and said anybody is welcome to apply.

Powers said the Marshall Scholarship provides tuition, fees and expenses — $25,000 — for students to study two years in England. The criteria is much broader than the Truman, she said, and includes students of any major who are looking to make a difference. It also demands a high level of academic excellence and involvement in many activities, she said.

Riemann has served as student body president and been a member of the Student Alumni Board and Union Governing Board.

Halabi has been a student senator, 1999-2000 Rotary scholarship winner and KSU Presidential Scholar. Both students also are nominated for Rhodes Scholarships.

Powers said the official announcement of Marshall Scholarships will be made in December.

"We're in a place where we're still needing to address the issue," Zilkie said.

"We haven't published a notice and we haven't scheduled any meeting," Zilkie said he does not believe the proposal will be ready for presentation until the commission's January meeting.

Knopp said he hopes things will come together more quickly. "I am hopeful staff can respond quick enough for us to be on for the Dec. 7 meeting," Knopp said.

Zilkie said the approximate time frame in which to complete everything and get a building permit is about 4 1/2 months.

Knopp said Wal-Mart wants to get started on the project by spring.

make this a goal," said George Strecker, committee chair and professor of mathematics. "We can certainly achieve it."

Strecker said he thought making ARL status a 10-year goal is reasonable — analogous to the years it took Bill Snyder to rebuild K-State's football program. K-State is the only public university in the Big 12 Conference that does not have ARL status.

ARL status requires specific achievements for the library, such as a certain number of staff members, university graduate programs, facility requirements, budget size and total volumes. It has been estimated by library staff in the past that to bring Hale up to ARL status would require its acquisition budget to grow to $5 million a year. The library's present acquisitions budget is around $2.5 million.

Also discussed at last Tuesday's meeting were alternative funding sources for the library, such as a campus exclusivity contract with a soft drink company or a proposed 5-percent "tax" on all new monetary gifts to the Foundation.

Knopp said Wal-Mart wants to get started on the project by spring.

make this a goal," said George Strecker, committee chair and professor of mathematics. "We can certainly achieve it."

Strecker said he thought making ARL status a 10-year goal is reasonable — analogous to the years it took Bill Snyder to rebuild K-State's football program. K-State is the only public university in the Big 12 Conference that does not have ARL status.

ARL status requires specific achievements for the library, such as a certain number of staff members, university graduate programs, facility requirements, budget size and total volumes. It has been estimated by library staff in the past that to bring Hale up to ARL status would require its acquisition budget to grow to $5 million a year. The library's present acquisitions budget is around $2.5 million.

Also discussed at last Tuesday's meeting were alternative funding sources for the library, such as a campus exclusivity contract with a soft drink company or a proposed 5-percent "tax" on all new monetary gifts to the Foundation.

Elevator explosion could land company $1 million in fines

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

HAYSVILLE, Kan. — The grain elevator explosion that killed seven workers last June could mean fines of about $1 million for DeBruce Grain Inc., an Occupational Safety and Health Administration official says.

Charles Adkins, OSHA's regional administrator in Kansas City, Mo., described the $1 million figure as a ballpark estimate of what the agency may require DeBruce to pay for safety violations at its huge elevator complex south of Wichita.

The fines could be reduced if DeBruce officials reach a settlement with OSHA lawyers.

DeBruce's penalty will be based on the number of violations at the elevator, how serious they were and whether management was aware of the problems, Adkins said.

He refused to discuss what violations OSHA officials discovered and what improvements will be necessary.

OSHA regulations allow fines of up to $7,000 for each violation. Companies with a history of repeat violations can be fined up to $70,000 for each violation, if OSHA can prove officials were aware of safety violations that could result in a worker's injury or death.

DeBruce had no previous violations at the elevator in Haysville. It had never been inspected by OSHA while it was owned by DeBruce.

Since federal law requires OSHA to finish an investigation within six months, the agency is planning to issue the fines on Dec. 8. However, the deadline can be extended if all parties agree, and DeBruce has asked OSHA's lawyers to do so to give it time to negotiate a settlement.

OSHA official gives ballpark figure as estimate of possible fine to DeBruce

It is not unusual for OSHA to negotiate a settlement, sometimes cutting fines by one-third to one-half, to avoid the cost of a drawn-out legal battle, said Debbie Berkowitz, the head of health and safety for the Food and Commercial Workers Union in Washington, D.C.

"You can assume by the fact we've been requested to talk about a pre-citation settlement ... that the parties (DeBruce officials) have reason to believe there are going to be pretty significant violations and penalties," Adkins said.

"We will talk and see what they have to offer, but we're not going to be vacating our position on what conditions existed in that facility and the severity of the violations that we have identified," he said.

Dave Higday, an investigator with the state fire marshal's office, said he ruled out criminal activity and concluded the explosion was an accident.

Dennis McCulloch, a spokesman for DeBruce, declined to comment.

The largest fine ever proposed by OSHA was $11.5 million for a 1991 explosion at an IMC Fertilizer plant in Louisiana that killed eight people and injured 42.

The company settled the same day for $10 million.

Nearly six months after the explosion at the Haysville elevator, some grain continues to smolder in some of the tunnels on the north end of the complex, said Don Paul Jones, owner of Houston Grain Trading Inc., which salvages grain from the debris of explosions, fires and floods.

He said he expects the salvage work to wrap up in two weeks.

DeBruce reopened the south end of the elevator in September. Company spokesman McCulloch has said flare-ups that have occurred since the reopening do not pose a danger, because they are not near the operations.

The company recently made safety improvements to its 21-million-bushel facility, installing a new conveyor-belt system in the elevator's south end and coating grain with an edible oil to reduce dust.

FINAL STAND

K-State senior defensive back Keith Black celebrates as he heads to the locker room after the Missouri game Saturday night in Columbia, Mo. Black downed a James Garcia punt on the Missouri 1-yard line with 3:04 left in the fourth quarter, putting the Tigers 99 yards from the go-ahead touchdown. The Tigers' comeback effort fell short at the K-State 42-yard line, and the Cats prevailed, 31-25. FOR FULL COVERAGE OF THE GAME, SEE SPORTS ON PAGE 6.

Union officials put food cart in Throckmorton

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State Student Union food representatives adapted to meet the needs of K-State students and faculty with classes on the north end of campus.

Today, a new era begins at Throckmorton Hall. A food cart called Treehouse will open in Throckmorton's first-floor lobby. The food cart will feature items such as biscuits and sausage gravy and doughnuts at breakfast and soups and sandwiches at lunch time.

"Fresh food and sizable sandwiches which fill you up will be on the menu," said Cindie Snyder, marketing and promotions manager for the Union.

Treehouse will be open 8 a.m. to 4 p.m. Monday through Thursday and 8 a.m. to 2 p.m. on Fridays. Even though Treehouse opens today, a ribbon-cutting ceremony will

Graduate student makes rare catch

■ Biology student catches fish that is on endangered-species list.

By JENNIFER WHITE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Fishermen tell a variety of stories, from the one that got away to the magical fish whose length increases with every retelling.

Patrick Braaten, graduate student in biology, doesn't have to lie to make his fish story interesting. His catch is on the endangered-species list.

Braaten is working with the Kansas Cooperative Fish and Wildlife Research Unit, six other universities and one state agency to investigate age, growth, recruitment and habitat use of fish on the Missouri and Yellowstone rivers from Montana to St. Louis.

Braaten was on the Missouri River, near Leavenworth, Kan., when he discovered a pallid sturgeon in his net.

"He was in the net with two shovelnose sturgeons and a channel cat," Braaten said. "When we use the trammel net, we know what we will catch. We weren't looking for this particular species."

Braaten is not the typical fisherman, though. He doesn't use any fancy lures or aluminum poles but does use a variety of nets, such as the trammel net (which is 75 feet long and drifts with the current), seines and a benthic trawl, which is like a sled with a net attached to the back. Braaten also relies on the electrofishing method.

"We electrify the water. It stuns the fish slightly,

Cross country runners race in national championships today

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Once again, a K-State athletic team will be in the national spotlight.

Coming off of a Midwest Regional Championship, the No. 14 K-State women's cross country team will clash with national powerhouses at the NCAA Cross Country Championships at Rim Rock Farm in Lawrence today.

With his 10th-place finish at the Midwest Regional, sophomore Brandon Jessop will run for an individual title in the men's competition.

Jessop has two first-place finishes this year. He won the Woody Greeno Invitational and the UMKC dual.

The Wildcat women have been on fire lately, winning their last three meets. Before grabbing the Midwest Regional title, K-State won its first Big 12 Conference title and a first-place finish at the Auburn Invitational.

"They're a talented bunch, eager to do well," head coach Randy Cole said. "What's exciting is they still have a lot to learn. That bodes well for nationals, and it bodes well for the future."

Today's competition will be loaded with nationally ranked cross country programs. No. 1 Brigham Young will look to repeat its 1997 championship, while No. 6 Stanford will attempt to redeem its second-place finish from a year ago.

In addition to K-State, five Big 12 teams will participate: Missouri, who has finished second to the Wildcats in two straight meets, and Baylor, Texas, Oklahoma State and Nebraska.

"We are representing ourselves, K-State, our conference and our region," Cole said. "We hope to do ourselves proud and get a top-15 finish."

Cole said not everyone ran to their capabilities at the Midwest Region Championships last week.

"Everyone needs to contribute. Our front runners need to run well, and our sixth and seventh runners need to step it up," he said. "At Nationals, you need to have everyone do well. Every point you can score counts."

Annie Wetterhus, who went as an individual to the NCAA Championships last year, said she had hoped all season for the team to qualify.

"My goal is to place in the top 10," she said. "If everyone runs to their capability, we will have a good shot."

This will be the Wildcats' 10th NCAA Cross Country Championship appearance, which ranks K-State seventh on the NCAA appearances list.

Club hopes to collect food for local shelter

KSU Food Science and Technology Club is spreading holiday cheer by sponsoring a food drive for Manhattan Emergency Shelter Inc.

However, it needs help. The club wants to fill the shelter's cupboards with non-perishable foods — pasta, beans, rice, peanut butter, canned fruits and vegetables.

"Most people who have a lower income meet their needs with more staple foods, meat and potatoes, rather than fruits and vegetables," Dru Earls, club vice president, said.

Three drop-off sites are on campus. They are located at the offices of Melvin Hunt, professor of animal sciences and industry, in Weber 224; Karen Schmidt, associate professor of animal sciences and industry, in Call 224; and Pamela Lawson, research assistant in grain science and industry, in Shellenberger 109A.

"We are grateful for anything people will give," Lawson, club president, said.

The shelter is the only one in Manhattan that takes families as a group. It can house up to 26 people at a time.

"Last year, we housed approximately 500 people, but that doesn't include people who only came for meals," said Sarah Johnston, client services director for the shelter.

It operates on an annual $500 food budget, which doesn't include commodities.

"Food drives allow us to use our food money for other things," Johnston said. "We could buy pumpkin pie or turkeys."

The shelter basically runs on donations.

"They directly benefit the people who live here, because it shows that the community cares about them," Johnston said.

The club not only is donating its time to this food drive; it also is donating its own money to buy food and contacting large companies to ask for their support.

"We encourage anyone to donate, and it is staying in the area," Lawson said.

The food drive started Tuesday and will run through Dec. 11. The shelter also is accepting new toys for children along with the non-perishable food items.

Thanksgiving dinner open to all in town

Students who can't make it home for Thanksgiving can join Manhattan residents for Thanksgiving dinner.

The Flint Hills Breadbasket will be having its 11th Community Thanksgiving Dinner, which is open to anyone in the community who wants a meal.

"We just want to make sure that there isn't a student, elderly person or family who will spend Thanksgiving by themselves," said Shirley Bramhall, executive director of Flint Hills Breadbasket.

The organization expects to serve around 1,000 people Thanksgiving day, Bramhall said.

The dinner will be at Manhattan High School East Campus. The entrance to the lunchroom is at 10th and Houston streets.

Bramhall said she encourages everyone to join the community family.

"It is designed to make sure that they have a great time and know that the community cares," she said. "It is just like being at home."

The dinner is served restaurant style; guests are waited on by volunteers.

Bramhall said that although Flint Hills Breadbasket was one driving force behind the dinners, it was not alone in working to make them successful.

"We are not the ones that do it," she said. "There are so many volunteers. It is an orchestrated effort."

Richard De Bowes, head of the Department of Clinical Sciences, is one of the volunteers.

"It is a mixed crowd of people who help with the dinner," De Bowes said. "We try to make good things happen for people who are less fortunate."

Much of the food for the dinner is donated, but the Flint Hills Breadbasket's Holiday Fund helps purchase items not donated.

The group also delivers meals to shut-ins and civil service workers who have to work on Thanksgiving, which is one of the reasons they need so many volunteers, Bramhall said.

Anyone interested in volunteering should contact the Flint Hills Breadbasket at 537-0730.

Man shoots girlfriend; turns gun on himself

HUTCHINSON, Kan. — A 23-year-old Hutchinson man shot and wounded his former girlfriend then turned the gun on himself four days after she requested a protective order against him, the woman told police.

Leslie Shoemaker, 20, called police at about 5:45 Saturday saying Scott McAllister had forced his way into her home carrying a 12-gauge shot gun and had fired on her as she ran for the door, Lt. John Tracy said.

As Shoemaker lay bleeding, McAllister put the gun under his chin and fired again, she told police.

McAllister was dead when police arrived, Tracy said.

Shoemaker remained hospitalized at Hutchinson Hospital on Sunday. Tracy said her injury was not believed to be life threatening.

Hutchinson Police had responded to two previous calls involving Shoemaker and McAllister during the two weeks prior to the shooting, Tracy said.

On Tuesday, the court issued a Protection from Abuse Order, at Shoemaker's request, directing McAllister to stay away from her.

Two days later, she told Reno County sheriff's deputies that McAllister had violated the restraining order by "calling and going to her house," said Lt. William Peterman.

A deputy tracked down McAllister, handed him a copy of the protective order and warned him that he was to have no further contact with Shoemaker.

Coverage of scandal gives young reporters different perspective

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Thousands of young people became journalists in the 1970s because of the profession's performance in unearthing the Watergate scandal. By contrast, budding high school journalists are saying they're eager to enter the profession in spite of its reporting of the Monica Lewinsky affair.

"I don't think journalists are seen as very good people lately," said Liz Schwind, a 15-year-old from Traverse City, Mich. "You see this whole Bill Clinton thing and everybody sort of blames the media."

But with the optimism of youth, the sophomore added, "You think maybe you could make the difference. You think that maybe you could tell the truth."

Liz and more than 5,000 other high school students from across the country flocked to Washington this weekend for what was called the largest-ever scholastic journalism conference to learn how to get into the business.

They talked about everything from designing pages to on-line publishing and Lewinsky and the press performance as the story of her relationship with President Clinton unraveled.

Several widely reported cases of plagiarism contributed to the public's waning faith in the press, already soured by the hours of TV time devoted to the Clinton scandal, including clips from video and audio tapes.

At the conference, the journalistic wannabes heard a speech by former Wall Street Journal and New York Times reporter Charles Kaiser that minced no words about their chosen profession's latest big story.

"This is really the worst example I've seen of pack journalism in my lifetime," Kaiser said Friday. "If your mission is to entertain rather than inform, then I hope you'll go to Hollywood rather than into journalism."

Style points count in annual comb-out contest

By AMANDA EWING
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The curlers were taken from the mannequins' hair, and each student took a nervous step back. There would be only 30 minutes to create a look worthy of first place.

The competition began, and brushes instantly went to work. Hair was sectioned, combed and twisted into place. The tension was as thick as the haze of hair spray that filled the Stateroom in the K-State Student Union on Friday.

After 30 minutes, it was over, and 52 Crum's Beauty College students looked at their creations. Some looked pleased and others upset as they contemplated the evening hair design they had created on their mannequin.

The mandatory comb-out competition was one part of Crum's annual competition. Earlier that day, other students had competed in flat-nail art and makeup competitions.

In the end, two students, Emily Koster and Traci Kramer, won first place in their divisions.

"This is totally unexpected," a surprised Kramer said. "I feel so excited."

Kramer's winning creation was a French twist accented with small gold balls and narrow black and brown feathers. Her mannequin was draped in a leopard-skin print smock.

Koster, who also won with a French twist with a crisscross top, was shocked as well.

"I didn't expect to win at all," Koster said.

The rules of the competition were taken from Chicago and New York hair competitions. The students' designs were judged by three members of the Kansas Hair Fashion Committee. The judges looked for form, balance and creativity.

The students were divided based on the number of hours they have completed at the college. Division I included those who had completed more than 320 hours of the 1,500-hour course, and Division II included those with fewer than 320 hours.

Cheryl Wilson, trainer for the competition, said the competition is a motivational experience, and it makes the students better stylists.

"They learn to focus on something, and they learn through repetition," Wilson said.

The use of mannequins allowed for greater ease of practice, as students could take the heads home with them. Each mannequin had real human hair, and the students had a choice of either ethnic or Caucasian hair.

"If you can do a mannequin, you can do real hair," judge Barbara Crider said. "Mannequins are harder because of the texture of the hair, and you don't have the bone structure to work with. You have to be more creative on a mannequin."

Karla Givens, Crum's director of Clark Foster combs a mannequin's hair during the Crum's Beauty College 1998 Student Comb-out, Flat Nail Art and Make-up competition Friday night in the Stateroom of the K-State Student Union. Foster was competing in the Division I comb-out competition.

admissions, said the competition is very stressful, and the students feel a lot of tension.

"They're under pressure because they only have 30 minutes, and they're in front of their family," Givens said.

The competition's ultimate goal is not to make one student feel better than the others but to provide a valuable learning experience.

"This kind of training is good for young people," judge Dixie Jones said. "It teaches them discipline, and they become much better with practice, and that makes them become better in the industry."

Fox, Macklin hope to make book swap website more helpful for students

By BRENT STOVER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Thanks to the work of Bob Fox, senior in information systems, students have the opportunity to buy and sell their books over the Internet.

Last spring, Fox added the book-swap program to his already-existing home page.

"It was basically something I started last May," Fox said. "It became pretty popular with students."

Since he began the book swap, Fox has been working closely with Student Body Vice President Andy Macklin.

"With the increasing textbook prices, this is a good thing for students," Macklin said. "We're looking to please students and do better things for students."

During the student body elections last spring, Macklin and Student Body President Tracey Mann made the book-swap program one of their three main campaign issues.

"We came across this as kind of a national issue, happening at a lot of other schools right now," Macklin said. "We wanted to take a proactive stance. It's something we thought we could get done for students."

Students can use the page to post a book, find a book or remove a book. The

"If someone's looking for a book, at that same time they may post a book," Macklin said. "Those two really feed off of each other."

Fox said the program affords students a better opportunity to save money than buying and selling at a bookstore.

By skipping the middle man, Fox said he estimates that students can split the difference in the price of buying and selling books each semester.

"If people don't find a book in time, this allows them good leeway to find the book," Fox said.

Fox will be graduating in May, and at that time, he will turn the World Wide Web page over to the control of Student Governing Association.

"I think what will happen is, we'll create a position to take care of things like this," Macklin said. "Once we create the new positions to take care of that — that's when the Web site will be officially taken over."

Fox and Macklin are in the process of adding two new dimensions to the Web page.

Statistics will be added to the bottom of the page, showing how many people are using the program. Macklin said the statistics would allow them to determine whether the program caused any harm to sales at the K-State Student Union Bookstore.

They also are adding the option for students to put requests for specific books on the page.

Students then will have the option to be notified by e-mail when the book is for sale by another student.

"Here at K-State, it's just in the fledgling stages," Macklin said, "but nationally, it's becoming very popular."

With the end of fall semester coming soon, Fox and Macklin will have their next chance to see how popular the book-swap program has become.

"Everybody on this campus who buys textbooks can sympathize with the fact that they're too expensive, and they need to be cheaper," Macklin said.

OUR VIEW

Collegian editors thankful for much

Because Thanksgiving is upon us, the editorial board felt it would be appropriate to list some of the things we've come to be thankful for over the course of the past semester.

We are thankful to have a roof over our heads and the chance for a college education.

We are thankful for the few teachers who didn't schedule assignments or tests for the Monday after break.

We are thankful for the mystery Hale Library donor who gave a generous sum to our ailing house of knowledge.

We are thankful for all of the people who have been nominated for Rhodes, Marshalls, Trumans and Goldwaters again this year.

We are thankful enrollment is over.

We are thankful for the people who use the free-speech zone behind the K-State Student Union for its intended purpose.

We are thankful that the murder rate is down again in the United States.

We are thankful for programs like the Wildcat Walk program for keeping the crime rate down in the United States.

We are thankful that the city of Manhattan has installed new signs and blinking lights at crosswalks along Manhattan Avenue.

We are thankful for the obstacle course along Anderson Avenue that changes daily so we can test our driving skills.

We are thankful for the greenhouse effect and La Niña, which allow us to wear shorts in the middle of November.

We are thankful for Union Stateroom fan loaves.

We are thankful for Stateroom biscuits and gravy.

We are thankful for snacks in the vending machine that cost less than 50 cents.

We are thankful for the few pay phones where the charge for a local call is still 25 cents.

We are thankful the women's cross country team is in the national tournament.

We are thankful for Brandon Jessop, who is running at nationals.

We are thankful for the volleyball team and the opportunity it has given us to be hosts for part of the NCAA Tournament.

We are thankful for the football team.

We are thankful for a last-second win at the University of Missouri.

We are thankful that we can get in and out of Manhattan faster than students at Missouri can get in and out of Columbia.

We are thankful to have food.

We are thankful to be going home for all of the food ... er, time with our family.

We are thankful if, when we get done with our food, nobody minds when we sit on the couch and open our pants to relieve pressure.

We are thankful for another Thanksgiving where we get to watch "Home Alone."

We are thankful to be getting home safely.

Have a good Thanksgiving, and enjoy your break.

READERS WRITE

Sackett makes Collegian better

Editor,

Just wanted to drop you a note thanking you for having Sam Sackett as a columnist. Compared with the sorry drivel coughed up each week by Mary VanLeeuwen, et al., Sackett is a breath of fresh air. I know he speaks for the views of a significant number of students on campus — students who are proud to have him as their voice.

I actually find it amusing to read the repeated denunciations of Sackett by his detractors. It seems they are the ones filled with ignorance, intolerance and even hate. Typically, their letters resort to such time-honored liberal tactics as name-calling, misrepresentation, ignoring the real issues at hand and lumping your opponent together with some totally unrelated but highly distasteful groups of people.

Sackett is the best columnist the Collegian has, and I always look forward to reading what he has to say.

Thanks for giving a voice to reason, sanity and truth, even if it isn't politically correct.

IT'S THE END OF THE WORLD AS WE KNOW IT AND I DON'T FEEL FINE BECAUSE IT IS

TIME TO REPENT

VIEWPOINT
CORBIN H. CRABLE

The new millennium is upon us, and I'm trying to get ready for the madness.

With all of the different messages we're receiving about this crucial point in history, it's quite easy to become confused about what to do to get ready for it and where our priorities should lie. I don't know about you, but I'm kept busy enough by my classes and two part-time jobs; I sure don't need to have the added worry of a great economic crisis, the second coming of Christ and the end of mankind.

Still, I whipped up a small list of what I need to get done in the next year or so; that way, I'm somewhat prepared for the millennium.

1. Terminate Swiss bank account.
2. Repent sins.
3. Bake muffins for Jesus Christ.
4. Build bomb shelter.
5. Pick up loaf of bread and gallon of milk at grocery store.

Let's see ... yep, I think that does it. And I have to do all of this in the space of one little year?

If those nutty prophets and Psychic Friends Network people are correct, I should be getting ready for Armageddon.

I'll need to begin constructing a bomb shelter soon; then I guess I'll really know if a college student can survive on just ramen noodles. I'll also have plenty of time to get caught up on all that reading for American Survey that I have put off for so long.

Hopefully, I'll be ready for the whole second coming/economic crisis thing. I can just imagine how that would go ... I'd be sitting in my room, counting my money (because I'd just closed my bank account), when suddenly, a blinding white light floods my room, and a booming voice speaks to me ...

God: GREETINGS, MY SON. I HAVE COME TO PASS JUDGMENT UPON THE EARTH.

Me: Oh, hi, God. You're early! But luckily, I knew you were coming, so I baked a pie. I hope you like Dutch apple.

God: I HAVE COME FOR MY CHOSEN PEOPLE. YOU MUST COME WITH ME.

Me: Sure, whatever. But first, I need to finish counting my money. I need to make sure it's all here, you know.

God: MY CHILD, I AM TAKING YOU TO HEAVEN. WE MUST NOW DEPART.

Me: Darn it, I'm missing a twenty. Hey God, would you be a pal and help me look for a missing $20 bill?

God: LISTEN, KID, I HAVE MILLIONS OF OTHER PEOPLE TO PICK UP, AND THE MOTOR'S RUNNING. HOP IN, AND LET'S GO.

Me: Aw, come on. Just help me with this, and I promise I'll do whatever you want.

God: YEAH, HOW MANY TIMES HAVE I HEARD THAT ONE FROM YOU?

Me: OK, point well taken. I'll just look for it myself.

(Sound of God impatiently tapping his foot and sighing heavily.)

God: SHEESH, I DON'T HAVE ALL DAY. I'M A BUSY PERSON, YOU KNOW ...

This proves my point that there's so much to worry about and so little time in which to take care of everything.

BEING THE CREATOR OF THE UNIVERSE ISN'T ALL WINE AND ROSES.

Me: I'm sorry, I'm working as fast as I can.

God: THAT'S IT, NOW I'M WAY OFF SCHEDULE. I'VE GOT TO GO, KID. SEE YA IN ANOTHER 2,000 YEARS.

(There is a sound of screeching tires in the background, and the light disappears.)

Me: Ooo, I found it! That $20 bill was stuck to the bottom of my shoe the whole time! God ... where did you go?

This proves my point that there's so much to worry about and so little time in which to take care of everything. You can read the National Enquirer and build your own bomb shelter for the end of the world, you can liquidate your assets, or you can brush up on your Bible reading, but the point is, as hard as we might try, the future is largely unpredictable. The best we can do is to prepare in the best way we can.

Believe me, I'd love to elaborate on the subject, but I've got to get busy repenting my sins. By my calculations, I'll be busy with this for another year anyway, so I'd better begin now while my pineapple upside-down cake is rising in the oven. I hope God has a sweet tooth.

Thanksgiving conjures up all kinds of good, bad emotions

VIEWPOINT
CHRIS PIATT

The holidays can be a real pain, and candied yams do not a Norman Rockwell picture make.

After taking an informal survey, I discovered that with the exception of spending five days away from classes, most of my friends are not excited about the impending Thanksgiving break. With so much pressure to make every moment with loved ones a cherished moment, tensions run silent and deep.

The road trip home often means a stomach like a clenched fist, obsessive chain-smoking and pitch-black music on the radio in anticipation of the 72 coveted hours to come. I don't smoke, so my vices already are limited.

Thanksgiving is a beautiful idea and a much needed one. College students especially should benefit from it. By the end of November, the money is gone, enrollment frustrations are mounting, it's freezing, and finals are a heart-beat away. It's a perfect time to regroup, assess the situation at hand and realize that in the grand scheme of things, all the knots will untie themselves. There is much for which to be thankful.

The inherent barrier is that college is all about angst. Cynicism is chic. Passion is uncool. Suddenly happy childhood memories are reflected back as bad reruns of "The Wonder Years," and everything is tainted.

A bountiful celebratory meal is now societal gluttony. A holiday based in American imperialism is politically irresponsible. Beloved relatives are feared fascists. A trip back to one's own hometown means the possibility of encountering someone from your high school that you don't really know anymore, and the result will be excruciatingly shallow small talk.

Everything has to be perfect, so everything seems terribly imperfect. Thanksgiving is a delicate balance.

I have a close friend whose uncle died of cancer a week ago. Then her younger brother was beaten severely in an gang fight. He'll probably be having reconstructive surgery a few days after Thanksgiving. Her family's holiday trip to St. Louis had to be canceled to deal with the situation.

Today, she's driving back home to have a meal with her family and give thanks for all that God has given them. Sound like rough going?

Well, actually, yes. It's really rough. There's no need to glorify it. However, in an attempt to keep spirits light, her mother is considering renting a huge deep-fry vat and frying the turkey in the backyard. Just an attempt to break up the monotony.

Sitcoms this time of year portray Thanksgiving as a madcap, screwball laugh riot where everything that could possibly go wrong, does. I guess that's because laughing about such antics is easier than crying about them.

I'm not sure where or when this holiday lost its wonder. It was probably lost amid the pre-Christmas rush, the football hype and America's loss of interest in all things sentimental. There's just nothing about the day that allows for a McDonald's tie-in or a Disney release.

I love my mother, and today I am driving home to eat her cooking and make fun of her Thanksgiving decorations, because that's what we do every year at my house.

I like to believe it is that the concept is too profound for people to deal with.

Thanksgiving is my mother's favorite holiday, and she asked me to write a column about it. She's frustrated that nobody takes it seriously.

I love my mother, and today I am driving home to eat her cooking and make fun of her Thanksgiving decorations, because that's what we do every year at my house.

After dinner, I am going to listen to my brother play the piano and help my father put up the Christmas tree. I will not be cynical. I am thankful to have them.

I also will be thankful that Woody Allen has a new movie, that CopyCo's prices coincide with the Cats' rankings, that I get to write a weekly column and anything else I can think of. I'll be thinking hard.

And that's going to be my holiday. Thanks. Really.

Santa comes to town on a Hog

■ 7 bikers escort Santa Claus to Westloop Shopping Center, where he'll be until Christmas.

By JAIMIE HARTTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

He arrived amidst excited murmurs of "When's he coming?" and "I hope he gets here soon." As the time drew closer, children were jumping up and down, their faces beaming and their eyes wide and bright.

When he was spotted, the children couldn't control their excitement any longer. Some tugged at their parent's clothes, and others began to race around the parking lot.

Yes, Santa Claus arrived, but not in his sleigh. Santa received a ride on a Harley-Davidson motorcycle to "Santa's House," which was a little white house trimmed in red and green with green garland at Westloop Shopping Center.

Richard Harrison, who escorted Santa on his bike, said this is the second year for Santa to ride in on a Harley. It is part of the All Bikers Aim Towards Education program.

"Last year, we had a lot more bikes show up, but next year we'll put the word out, and we'll get more bikes," Harrison said.

Judy Padgett, who was one of the seven motorcyclists to escort Santa, said the main problem was trying to coordinate everyone's schedules.

"It was a lot colder last year, but more people showed up," Padgett said.

The lack of a crowd of children waiting to climb on Santa's lap and tell them their heart's desires didn't seem to affect the ones already there.

Alissa Dray, a first grader, waited patiently for her turn.

"I want a real kitty cat," Dray said. "A white, fluffy one named Snowball."

Bret Shoemaker, 3, didn't have any reservations about what he wanted from Santa Claus. He walked up to Santa and said, "Hi, Santa, I want Power Rangers and a fire truck."

Marie Dellen, coordinator of the event and Santa's helper, took pictures of the children on Santa's lap and handed out peppermint candy canes. Dellen said the work that went into "Santa's House" was offered by several businesses.

She said Carl Denning Construction built the house, Thomas Sign Advertising painted it and Waters True Value Hardware made a bench for Santa to sit on. The proceeds went to the Manhattan Boys and Girls Club Inc.

Santa said he has been playing the part of Santa for 40 years.

He prefers to keep his identity to himself, because he said Santa isn't only for children but for adults as well. He has had some experiences with adults trying to pull off his beard to find out who he is.

"Adults are worse than kids, because they can't restrain themselves," he said.

Santa will be at Santa's House at Westloop every weekend until Christmas from 2 to 4 p.m. on Saturdays and 1-3 p.m. on Sundays.

Free movies for children will start next weekend on Saturday mornings at 10:30. Admission will be two cans of food, which will be donated to the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

Society of Creative Writers launches literary magazine for students to show off their talent

By JENNIFER WHITE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students and faculty now have a place to display their artistic and creative abilities.

The Paw Print is a new monthly publication available for students and faculty to submit creative works such as essays, short stories, poems and, eventually, drawings.

"Our first issue just came out," said Melody Orloff, sophomore in English and secondary education and Paw Print editor. "We basically had submissions from members of the Society for Creative Writers, but we want everyone on campus to be able to submit to it."

The Paw Print can be purchased at the K-State Student Union Bookstore, Varney's Book Store, Copy Co., and Claflin Books and Copies. The magazine will be printed monthly, except for January and the summer months.

"I hope it will be an ongoing thing throughout the years," Orloff said.

Orloff said she hopes the cost of purchasing the magazine eventually will go down.

"I think $1.50 is too much to pay for a 20-page magazine," Orloff said. "But right now, we are trying to find a happy medium with our cost of production. As the magazine grows, it will cost less to produce."

Orloff said the magazine will publish material as long as it is fairly clean in language and sexual content. Any submissions of questionable content will be reviewed by the Society of Creative Writers. Submissions can be sent to Orloff via e-mail at mdu5749@ksu.edu or to the English Department.

"The deadline for submitting material is the first of every month, unless I don't have enough to fill the magazine, then I will take late entries," Orloff said.

For the first issue, Orloff relied on her fellow club members for material.

"I submitted a short story titled 'Surprise,'" said Teresa Huffman, sophomore in English and pre-veterinary medicine.

Huffman, who has been writing since she was 13, said that having her material in the magazine means people finally will get to read it.

"I write quite a bit, but most of it other people never see," Huffman said.

"Having it in the magazine, now people can read it."

Eleven up, 11 down.
With a 31-25 victory at Missouri on Saturday, K-State wrapped up a perfect regular season and kept its drive for a return trip to the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl alive. The triumph in Columbia, Mo., extended K-State's 19-game winning streak and built momentum for the Dec. 5 match-up with Texas A&M in the Big 12 Conference Championship game in St. Louis.

However, the Cats' first test in the Show-Me State didn't come easy. A victory wasn't secured until 1:15 remained in the fourth quarter, when Missouri quarterback Corby Jones' pass fell incomplete on fourth down and 15 from the Cats' 42-yard line, allowing K-State to run out the clock.

In a game that featured comebacks by both squads, K-State struck first. The Cats took their initial possession 62 yards and chewed up just less than five minutes, capping off an 11-play drive with a 10-yard touchdown pass from Michael Bishop to receiver Gavin Peries. Bishop finished the day with 13 of 26 passing for 157 yards, a touchdown and an interception, 104 rushing yards and a touchdown on the ground.

The Mizzou defense appeared to have Bishop contained on the play, but the senior Heisman Trophy candidate sprung free to the outside and found Peries open in the right corner of the end zone.

Not even divine intervention could take the Missouri Tigers' 99 yards against the K-State defense in the waning moments of Saturday's game.

Trailing the Wildcats 31-25 with 3:04 left to play in the game, Tiger quarterback Corby Jones took the field for one final shot at putting a blemish on K-State's record.

"I prayed, and the good Lord was the only thing that was going to allow us to be successful," Jones said. "I said a prayer and kind of put it in his hands and went out there and just played."

In order to take the lead, the Tigers needed to drive 99 yards, thanks to the K-State punt team.

Facing fourth down and 4 yards to go from Missouri's 39-yard line, the Wildcats sent punter James Garcia in, attempting to pin the Tigers deep in their own territory.

"We had a directional punt," Garcia said. "I was aiming right for the numbers. ... Luckily I hit it well, and it turned out great."

On the punt coverage, defensive back Keith Black raced to the corner of the field and knocked down the ball at the 1-yard line. The crowd reacted as if Black touched the ball after he went into the end zone, but the officials kept it at the 1-yard line.

"I found the goal line, and I turned around, and I didn't think I went into the end zone," Black said. "I knew if I would have caught it, I would have went into the end zone, so I just knocked it down and thankfully, it just died right there where it was."

Garcia said the play could have been the difference in the game because the Tigers, who had compiled 383 total yards of offense at that point, had been driving the ball effectively.

"That's 19 yards of offense," Garcia said about downing the ball at the one-

The Cats took a 10-0 lead midway into the second quarter, but Mizzou responded with a time-consuming drive of its own. On second and goal from the K-State 5-yard line, Jones eluded Ben Leber and extended the ball at the goal line for the Tigers' first appearance on the scoreboard. The lengthy drive brought the over-capacity crowd of Faurot Field back to life.

Switching to a two-minute offense, Bishop led the Cats to midfield before his pass was picked off, setting up MU at their 47-yard line.

On two consecutive plays, Jones beat K-State cornerback Dyshod Carter twice on deep routs, the second a 20-yard scoring pass to receiver Kareem Wise that put the Tigers up 13-10.

A missed extra point left Mizzou up by 3 at halftime. Jones finished the day 14 of 30 for 249 yards of passing and scrambled for 54 yards and a touchdown.

"They couldn't beat us on the running game," defensive end Joe Bob Clements said. "The tough competitor Corby Jones is, he decided to throw it on us, and he did a hell of a job."

Faced with a halftime deficit for the second-straight week, the Cats quick-strike response at the start of the third quarter almost mirrored their performance against Nebraska on Nov. 14.

After the opening kickoff, a 55-yard run by Marlon Charles set up Bishop, who snuck across the goal line from the 1-yard line to regain the lead, 17-13.

The defense responded by holding the Tigers to a three-and-out series, and David Allen returned the 44-yard punt 47 yards to the MU 11. Two plays later, Frank Murphy took the pitch from Bishop and scrambled for a 9-yard score that put the Cats up by 11.

The hot streak ended, though, as Mizzou clawed back into the game to 24-22 at the start of the fourth quarter.

After another Murphy touchdown gave the Cats a little breathing room, the Mob responded with one of its most important stops of the season.

An 18-yard run by fullback Rob West set Mizzou up at the 3-yard line, but the 'D' stifled the Tigers. After a holding penalty on fourth down, MU was forced to settle for a 29-yard field goal.

"It wasn't a perfect performance, but we gave it all our effort," linebacker Travis Ochs said, "and that's what a good team's got to do."

After a James Garcia punt pinned the Tigers at their 1-yard line with 3:04 left in the game, the defense responded (see side bar), sealing the contest and the first 11-0 season in K-State history.

In the week preceding the game, some Missouri players talked about their lack of respect for K-State and predicted an upset. Agreeing that the Tigers presented a physical challenge, Ochs said he didn't appreciate Mizzou's lack of respect.

"That's something I've never really understood," he said. "We respect everybody we play against, and it seems to me nobody else really respects us."

"We're 11-0, everybody else really isn't, except for a few teams in the country."

While the Tigers can't claim the same record, Jones said he wasn't sure if

Travel trauma

K-State head coach Bill Snyder is used to battling it out on the ground and in the air. Friday night, Snyder witnessed another battle of land and air, except it wasn't on the football field.

With the team prepared to depart Manhattan Regional Airport early Friday evening for Columbia, Mo., the worlds of land and air transportation collided, literally, as one of K-State's team buses caught the wing of the plane it was boarding.

After the first bus had parked alongside the plane, the second bus attempted to pull between the two. The side of the bus struck the plane's wing, resulting in more than four hours of inspection that delayed the flight.

Knowing the importance of focus in a game with title ramifications, Snyder took the team back to Vanier Football Complex for meetings during the plane's inspection.

"It's important for our players not to get sidetracked by distractions," Snyder said. "With travel, you're more apt to have those types of things happen."

— Jon Balmer

the Cats' No. 1 ranking was justified. "It depends on where you put us," Jones said. "I mean, if you put them at No. 1, where does that leave us?"

"We felt we were the better football team out there today. We outplayed them. We just didn't get the victory."

In a game that turned into a grudge match with each physical play, the Cats held off MU and answered all critics who said the team would experience a letdown following the victory against Nebraska. Although the victory wasn't pretty, the result was enough to keep K-State's title dreams alive.

"We were ready for a battle today," offensive guard Jeremy Martin said. "They wanted a street fight, and they got one."

led the team in tackles with nine, broke up the final pass with 1:49 left to play, clinching the victory.

Despite giving up two long passes in the final minutes of the game, K-State linebacker Travis Ochs, who finished the game with five tackles — including a sack — said the defense came through when the Cats needed it the most.

"We knew every time they got down close, we started to shut them down," Ochs said. "That's the name of the game right there. They got some passes on us, but when we had to stop them, we did it."

Volleyball team loses to Texas Tech, defeats Baylor

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State volleyball team dropped its match to the Texas Tech Red Raiders in Lubbock, Texas, on Friday night, but it rebounded Saturday night in Waco to defeat the Baylor Bears in five games.

K-State won the first game of the Tech match 15-10, but the Red Raiders bounced back and won the next three, 9-15, 11-15 and 12-15, to take the match.

The Wildcats started strong with a 3-1 score and increased their lead with a 6-1 run. Tech eventually fell with 5-straight Wildcat points.

In the second game, the Cats started with another lead at 3-0, but a 6-1 Tech scoring run left the Cats behind 6-4. The Red Raiders ended the game powering by the Cats with an 11-3 run to even the match 1-1.

Scoring runs proved to be the key to victory for the Red Raiders as they whipped the Cats again late in the third game, rolling off 7 points to defeat K-State.

In the fourth and final game of the match, Tech went up early at 8-3 but weathered a K-State streak that tied it at 8. The Red Raiders finally knocked off the Cats, 12-15, to secure the match.

"We played well, but our defensive package had the tip covered on every possible situation," head coach Jim McLaughlin said. "We just let the tip fall. They beat us tipping the ball, and that's what is disappointing. We were also never able to get into a pure rhythm."

It was the first time the Cats lost a match to the Red Raiders after taking the first game and only the third time in K-State history overall.

Against Baylor, the Cats were victorious, but they had to do it in five games. Baylor came storming out and stunned the Cats with two-straight game wins. The final three games belonged to K-State, as the Wildcats had 35 kills and a .508 hitting percentage, the second-best mark in school history.

The fourth game had the Wildcats down early at 8-3, but K-State came fighting back to take the game 15-10. The fifth and final game was tied three times, but the Cats eventually took the game and match 15-13.

McLaughlin gave credit to players Dawn Cady and Kim Zschau.

"We just didn't get into an offensive rhythm," McLaughlin said. "Dawn and Kim got into a good rhythm on the left side, and they really carried us."

"Good teams are able to establish the left side," he said. "When things aren't going as well as you want them to go, you have to live on the left side, and we did that tonight."

Cats' Hawaiian vacation begins against Indiana

By JON BALMER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

While the rest of the campus will be enjoying time off from school this week, the K-State men's basketball team will spend part of its Thanksgiving break on the hardwood.

Before you shed a tear for the Cats, though, consider their destination — Hawaii.

The 3-0 Cats will be part of an eight-team field that includes Clemson, Syracuse and Michigan in the 1998 Maui Invitational. With three Top 25 teams in the pool, the Cats will get an early wake-up call on the progress of their play.

The holiday festivities begin tonight against No. 17 Indiana (4-0) at the Lahaina Civic Center. The game will be televised nationally by ESPN at 8 p.m.

Regardless of the game's outcome, K-State's second-round game will be Tuesday against either No. 12 Utah or Arizona State. The tournament concludes Wednesday.

K-State's last trip to Hawaii came in 1994, when the Cats defeated Southwest Texas and Hawaii to win the Hawaii Nike Festival.

The Cats are coming off of a 76-60 victory against Washburn on Wednesday.

"I WOULDN'T IMAGINE THAT IT WOULD TAKE A LOT OF DEBATE."

Livingston says impeachment debate would take little time

By JIM ABRAMS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Rep. Bob Livingston, eager to begin his term as House speaker with a clean slate, said Sunday he thinks the full House would need only a few hours to debate and vote on President Clinton's impeachment.

If the Judiciary Committee reports articles of impeachment to the House, Livingston said, "I wouldn't imagine that it would take a lot of debate."

He told NBC's "Meet the Press" that the House could vote after two or three hours of debate and "be done with it. If we did not have the votes to sustain the charge, that would be it."

Livingston, R-La., becomes speaker when the 106th Congress convenes in January, succeeding Newt Gingrich, who stepped down in part to accept blame for the Republicans' poor showing in the Nov. 3 election. Livingston, while insisting that the constitutional process must be followed, has said he wants the matter dealt with before he takes office.

He said there would be no hope of that happening, if more evidence of presidential wrongdoing is introduced to the Judiciary Committee. However, if the evidence is all in and the committee decides to refer articles of impeachment to the House, the matter should be ended this year, he said.

A majority vote in the House would send articles of impeachment to the Senate. That body would need a two-thirds vote to remove Clinton from office.

Gingrich's successor to speaker wants issue to be resolved by end of year

With 15 to 20 House Republicans said to be opposed to impeachment, the issue could die on the House floor. Asked whether impeachment would ever go to the Senate, Rep. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., a member of the Judiciary Committee, said, "Right now, with the political landscape, I would say no."

Graham, who has questioned whether the president's offenses are impeachable, wrote Clinton's lawyer David Kendall and asked him Saturday to provide evidence that would exonerate the president. Such information, he said, was crucial to his making a fair and responsible judgment.

Rep. Martin Meehan, D-Mass., appearing with Graham on ABC's "This Week," urged Livingston, as the incoming House leader, to negotiate language censuring the president for lying about his affair with Monica Lewinsky. If not, "Republicans will have no one to blame but themselves if the president gets off without anything at all."

Livingston said censure would be a possibility, but that such a step would better be left for after the House votes on impeachment.

White House adviser Paul Begala, on CBS' "Face the Nation," said it was "very, very important for the American people to understand that there's not some sort of negotiation or deal going on."

White House special counsel Greg Craig, on NBC and CNN's "Late Edition," agreed that no official talks were under way but said the president would accept punishment outside of impeachment.

"He is open to any kind of reasonable and serious proposal that has some prospect of bringing this to a just and rapid conclusion," Craig said.

Craig said the White House would respond this week to a list submitted by the Judiciary Committee of 81 questions about the Lewinsky affair. He said Clinton and his lawyers will meet to complete the response Tuesday, after he returns from a trip to Asia.

Even if House members decide that Clinton committed impeachable offenses, in the face of strong public opinion against removing the president from office, Craig asked, "Do you push the automatic impeachment button or do you exercise some discretion and use your judgment as to what should be done?"

Livingston agreed that politics will play a part in decisions on the fate of allegations against Clinton.

"If it is shown that the president of the United States is guilty of perjury, we have a major problem," Livingston said. "What to do about it is a political problem and should be weighed again by each member when it is presented to him."

Chiefs blow lead against Chargers

By BERNIE WILSON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SAN DIEGO — If the Kansas City Chiefs didn't completely bottom out in their Monday night debacle on national television, they did Sunday afternoon.

Two pass interference calls against James Hasty set up Charlie Jones' one-handed grab of Craig Whelihan's 1-yard touchdown pass with nine seconds left, and the San Diego Chargers stunned the Chiefs 38-37.

The Chargers (5-6) scored three touchdowns in the final 8:01 in rallying from a 17-point deficit. The Chiefs (4-7) lost their sixth-straight game, their longest stretch since dropping nine in a row in 1987, and sit alone in last place in the AFC West.

"I don't think we have done things to win," said coach Marty Schottenheimer, who is experiencing the worst stretch in his 10 seasons as Chiefs coach. "We have found ways to lose the game time and again."

The Chargers are only 5-6, but the big comeback prompted linebacker Junior Seau, leader of the NFL's top-ranked defense, to call it "one of the better games in my career. I hope they (his teammates) cherish it, because it doesn't happen very often."

It was San Diego's biggest rally since coming back from 18 down at Denver in 1994, and the first time it scored 21 points in the fourth quarter since 1973 at Pittsburgh.

Monday night, the Chiefs embarrassed themselves with penalties late in a 30-7 loss. Their leading pass rusher, Derrick Thomas, committed three of the team's five personal fouls during a fourth-quarter drive and was suspended for this game. Wayne Simmons committed another and was waived.

Sunday, two pass interference calls against James Hasty cost the Chiefs a game they had all but won.

"We were fine," Hasty said. "They made some calls on me, and it cost us the game."

After Pete Stoyanovich missed a 46-yard field goal attempt, the Chargers began on their 37, trailing 37-31 with no timeouts left and 51 seconds on the clock.

Hasty clipped the heels of rookie Michael Ricks on a long pass play, moving the ball from the 50 to the 13. After Whelihan threw three incompletions, Hasty committed another penalty on the 6-foot-5 Ricks in the end zone, this one on fourth down.

"We got tangled up," a downcast

Hasty said. I pulled my hand back. I wasn't trying to draw contact, but I guess my reputation supersedes me. It came down to me, and I made the mistake that cost us the game."

Whelihan's TD pass was behind Jones, but he reached back with his left hand and pulled in the ball to tie the score at 37-37. John Carney's PAT made the difference.

"I tried to just put it up for him because he's got such great hands," Whelihan said.

"I just stuck a hand up there, and it stuck," Jones said.

The Chargers won their second straight since Whelihan was promoted to starting quarterback over struggling rookie Ryan Leaf and have won one more than during their disastrous 1997 season.

About half of the crowd of 59,894 had left by the time the Chargers rallied. "Everyone thought we were out of the game," safety Rodney Harrison said. "30,000 fans had left the stadium, and we pulled it out."

Whelihan was 19-for-37 for 279 yards. Chiefs starter Rich Gannon was 20-for-33 for 304 yards, the first quarterback to pass for more than 300 yards against San Diego this year.

Kansas City's Bam Morris tied his career-high with three touchdowns, and both teams set season-scoring highs.

The Chiefs capitalized on three turnovers to score 13-straight points in the third quarter and take a 27-17 lead. The Chargers had just 3 yards offense that period.

Jerome Woods intercepted Whelihan's badly underthrown pass on the first play of the second half and returned it 19 yards to the Chargers 42. Cornerback Charles Dimry was called for pass interference against Derrick Alexander in the end zone, moving the ball to the 1. Morris dove over on the next play.

Two more Chargers turnovers led to field goals of 26 and 42 yards by Stoyanovich. Punter Louie Aguiar recovered Latario Rachal's fumbled punt return and Chester McGlockton recovered the ball when Whelihan simply dropped it.

Morris' final TD run gave Kansas City a 34-17 lead with 11:46 to play.

San Diego's Terrell Fletcher, replacing the injured Natrone Means, scored his second TD of the game from 4 yards, and Freddie Jones caught a 25-yard touchdown pass from Whelihan to make it 37-31. Those scores sandwiched a 50-yard field goal by Stoyanovich.

and they float to the surface," Braaten said. "We measure and weigh them before releasing them."

The pallid sturgeon that Braaten found in his net was more than 31 inches long and weighed 3-1/2 pounds. Braaten considered it relatively small.

"Pallid sturgeons are similar to shovelnose sturgeons but generally bigger," said Jim Liebelt, fisheries research biologist for the Montana Fish, Wildlife and Parks Department. "Pallid means whitish, so they are also lighter-colored."

Besides coloring, another distinguishing characteristic is the barbels, or sensory organs, under the pallid's nose, Liebelt said.

"Of the four, the outer two are longer and more crescent-shaped," Liebelt said. "The identification of this fish as a pallid is significant, because they are endangered in the lower part of the Missouri River, which is their native range."

Braaten said the fish might have been involved in a program run by the Missouri Department of Conservation aimed at re-establishing pallid sturgeons to the area.

"They raise the fish and release them into the river," Braaten said. "This shows the program may be working."

take place next week after Thanksgiving break.

Thomas Warner, who serves at Throckmorton as the Plant Sciences Committee chair, said Union officials approached the committee with the idea.

He said the food court is a welcome addition at Throckmorton.

"We are very pleased it is coming in," Warner said.

"We don't have to have faculty and students heading south to the Union for lunch."

that commonly is found in the Mississippi, Missouri and Yellowstone rivers but because of channelization in the lower part of the Missouri, a lot of the species' habitat has been destroyed.

"Channelization methods, such as wing dikes and putting rock along the shorelines, have destroyed much of the pallid sturgeon's habitat," Braaten said. "Dams in the upper part of the Missouri have potentially affected the spawning migration also."

Man-made dams are not the only cause of endangerment for the pallid sturgeon. Genetically, the fish is unable to reproduce for years.

"It takes 13-15 years for a female pallid to reach reproduction age," Liebelt said. "It can take males anywhere from seven-to-10 years."

This amount of time would explain why the study conducted by Montana Fish, Wildlife and Parks has not discovered any signs of reproduction in the last 20 years.

"In our studies here, we haven't seen any signs," Liebelt said. "We are not finding any sub-adults or young pallids in our area."

Programs such as the one in Missouri also are in place in Montana. Those who are involved said they hope to maintain or increase the population of pallids within the next few years.

"We do have a population of 250 in the lower part of the Yellowstone, where it meets with the Missouri River in North Dakota," Liebelt said.

Union representatives wanted to give students another place to eat, and Warner said the addition helps better serve the north end of campus.

"It gives a better quality of service to the faculty and students," Warner said.

"If there is a downside to it, we haven't figured it out yet."

Spring enrollment down more than 4,000 from fall

■ Some students dislike new prioritization system.

By DESIREE LAMBERSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With a little more than 15,500 students enrolled for the spring semester, enrollment is over. Numbers are down compared to the fall semester when about 20,000 students enrolled.

Associate Registrar Gunile DeVault said spring semester enrollment is typically lower than fall for various reasons such as transfers or grades.

Of the 15,500 students, DeVault said about one-third enrolled using the new K-State Access Technology System, which allows students to enroll via the Internet or over the telephone instead of waiting in line.

DeVault said the new system was successful.

"The vendor we bought the software from said that just from past experiences, if we could get about one-third of the students to change to a new process, we should feel successful," she said.

DeVault said she believes KATS will become more popular with the students.

"I think part of it is just not knowing — some weren't comfortable, some weren't sure about it, some were graduating and didn't see any need to change," she said.

April Hawks, junior in family and human services, said she chose not to use KATS because it was the first time the system had been used for enrollment.

"I went in (to Willard Hall) because it was the first time to do it using KATS, and I wanted to make sure nothing got messed up," Hawks said.

Although there were some small problems with the new system, DeVault said there were no significant problems.

Another change with the enrollment process this year was students could enroll at 8 a.m. instead of waiting for a specific time in the afternoon.

Michelle Peterie, senior in biological and agricultural engineering, said she chose to use KATS because she thought it would be faster and easier.

"I thought it would be faster because you could do it right at 8 a.m.," Peterie said. "I also wanted to avoid the lines."

Peterie said that she was happy with the system.

"It was fast and efficient," she said. Keith Koudele, senior in mechanical engineering, said he agreed.

"It was very convenient. I could go to the computer and just do it," he said.

Enrollment dates also were changed this year. In the past, students enrolled based on their number of hours. This year, students enrolled alphabetically based on their class.

Krista Hedrick, junior in management information systems, said she did not like the change.

"I think that they should go back to the old way — by hours instead of the alphabet," she said. "I didn't like how people who had 15 less hours than me got to enroll before I did."

DeVault said she believed it would take time for students to become accustomed to the new process of enrollment.

"I think it will take several semesters for everyone to get used to it," she said.

About 1/3 enroll with KATS

By JAMI STUMP
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

New technology normally takes awhile to get used to, but that isn't the case for the K-State Access Technology System (KATS) that students used to enroll.

For the first time, students enrolling for classes did not have to wait in line. KATS allows students to enroll in their classes by Internet or telephone.

Of the 15,500 students who enrolled for the spring semester, Associate Registrar Gunile DeVault said about one-third of them enrolled using the new system.

John Streeter, director of information systems, said he's happy about the increased use of KATS.

"It may have started out slow, but we have seen an exciting increase in usage," he said.

Streeter said there was a steady increase by three or four percent each

K-State volleyball team to open NCAA Tournament play in Provo, Utah

By RICH SMITH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's not often that a vacation in Provo, Utah, is met with great enthusiasm, but the K-State volleyball team is happy to have just that.

The Cats learned Sunday night they would be traveling west for the first round of the NCAA tournament, which begins Thursday. The announcement was met with a wave of cheers from the players and quiet approval from Coach Jim McLaughlin.

"Good draw," McLaughlin said. "We can get BYU after we get Georgetown."

The Cats' 18-11 regular season record netted them the sixth seed in the Central region and an opening match against the Big East Conference co-champion Hoyas on Friday.

"You have to play your best at all times," Kim Zschau, senior swing hitter, said of the single-elimination tournament.

"But it's a whole new season for us."

The promise of this second season comes on the heels of a sour end to the regular season, as the Cats dropped their last two matches to highly-ranked Nebraska and Colorado.

"It's not really like being woke up about anything," said senior middle blocker Val Wieck. "I think this weekend just showed us some things we still need to improve upon."

"We're in a great conference that prepares you for the postseason. The Big 12 is deep. On any given night, anybody could get beaten."

"We lost to a team that I think is going to win the national title," McLaughlin said. "I think Nebraska has the complete package to win it all."

"There were times that we played them real tough. I think we can play with anybody."

The tough lessons learned from Nebraska and Colorado, however, will serve the Cats well in the brutal world of the NCAA tournament.

"We recognize that we have to take a premium on early points, and taking care of plays and finishing things out," Zschau said.

Zschau and Wieck each finished their senior season in the K-State record books — Zschau holding the career records in kills, digs and attacks, and Wieck the record for block assists.

As veterans of K-State's last two tourney appearances, the two will be charged with keeping this young Wildcat team on an even keel.

"[Experience] will help us to help the younger players to play more relaxed," Zschau said.

"We just have to play like we've always played," Wieck added. "I think that with the things that we have as a team, we'll be fine."

A victory over the Hoyas would move the Cats into a second-round game, most likely against the host and second-seeded BYU Cougars, who tangle with Coastal Carolina in their opening-round match-up. For now, however, all eyes are focused on a first-round success.

"I like where we're going. I like where we're at," McLaughlin said. "We just have to take care of Georgetown."

"I feel good now — I'll feel great if we win two."

Congress divided on issue

■ House Republicans want Clinton to admit he lied.

By JIM ABRAMS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton must state clearly that he lied in the Monica Lewinsky affair before the House Judiciary Committee can consider any alternative to impeachment, Republican members said Sunday. But other lawmakers warned not to ignore momentum for the lesser action of censuring the president.

One Republican who has come out against impeachment, Rep. Peter King of New York, predicted that a vote to impeach would fall short in the House and pursuing that course could perpetuate the image that Republicans put the scandal ahead of the nation's legislative needs.

"It's going to make it harder to get our agenda across. We have to show that we can lead, that we can bring an end to

Organizers hope to use week to teach

■ AIDS Awareness Week begins on Tuesday.

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Don Fallon knows there is a need for AIDS-awareness education.

As a member of the clergy, Fallon, chairman of the KSU communicable-disease committee, said he conducts about one funeral service a year for someone who has died of AIDS.

This fact convinced Fallon of the need for AIDS education. He said AIDS Awareness Week, which begins Tuesday and goes through Friday, was created to educate the university and Manhattan community about the growing problem of AIDS.

"It is a time to create more awareness of the impact of this disease and what we can do," Fallon said.

AIDS Awareness Week takes place in conjunction with World AIDS Day, which is Tuesday. Tom Davis, HIV/AIDS educator for California Public Health Services, will be the main speaker during K-State's observance of the week.

Fallon said that Davis will speak about his personal and professional experiences in dealing with the disease. Davis does not have AIDS but lives with a partner who has the disease.

His first speech will be at 7 p.m. Tuesday at the memorial service for

Man shot following fight in Aggieville

Travis R. Sloan, senior in accounting, was shot early Friday morning outside of Scoreboard after an argument developed between a group of Sloan's friends and another group of people who had been in the bar.

Jeffrey R. House, 31, of Shawnee, Kan., was arrested minutes after the event as the suspect. According to reports from the Riley County Police Department, House was arrested for aggravated battery, possession of a concealed weapon, possession of marijuana and introduction of illegal drugs into a jail facility.

He was released on $15,000 bond. RCPD officers responded at around 1 a.m. to a report of shots fired in the 1100 block of Moro Street, according to reports.

Steve Fagan, the Scoreboard bartender working Friday morning, said the two groups of people were the only ones in the bar that night.

"I didn't even realize there was an argument between them. The suspect went outside and about half of the group with Travis followed him," Fagan said.

Shortly after they went outside, Fagan said he heard the shots fired but thought they were just firecrackers.

"I didn't realize what had happened until Travis came inside," Fagan said. "He said he needed a rag and lifted his shirt so I could see the wound. He wasn't sure what had happened."

Fagan said he told Sloan that he'd been shot, applied pressure to the wound and called the police.

Sloan said he was at Scoreboard with seven or eight of his friends, and there were three people in the group with House. He said he didn't know House or his friends.

One of Sloan's friends became involved in a fight with a member of House's group, Sloan said. While the two were fighting, Sloan said House pulled out a gun and fired into the air.

"He shot two times into the air, and then he pointed the gun at my friend. I grabbed the hand he was holding the gun with to try to stop him, and he shot me," Sloan said.

Sloan was shot in his right side just under the armpit. He was treated and released at Mercy Health Center on College Avenue. The bullet remains lodged in the connective tissue between Sloan's skin and ribs.

Fagan said House and his friends drove away as soon as the incident happened, but police were able to find House minutes later.

No other injuries were reported and no future arrests are anticipated, according to a RCPD release. The department continues to investigate.

No one in the RCPD's investigations division could be reached for comment Sunday.

Tree lighting tonight continues food drive

In an effort to spread the spirit and stop the hunger, the annual Mayor's Holiday Tree is kicking off the season of giving.

The tree lighting is scheduled for 6 tonight in Triangle Park in Aggieville.

"Usually when we light it, it's a signal that the season of giving is open," said Shirley Bramhall, director of the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

As the theme is "Spread the Spirit and Stop the Hunger," the Breadbasket set a goal of raising 150,000 pounds of food to benefit local residents.

"The Mayor's Holiday Tree is all about caring, sharing and giving," Bramhall said.

Other than lighting the tree, the program will honor area pacesetters, who donated more than 100 pounds of food or $100, and winners of the Random Acts of Kindness Award. The K-State Hospitality Club will provide refreshments, and the K-State Choir will sing Christmas carols.

The money raised also goes to benefit programs such as Toys for Tots, Operation Santa Claus, Adopt-A-Family and Shop with a Cop.

"It's just a way to kick off the giving season and a traditional way to start giving to the Breadbasket," said Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association. "It's a neat tradition because hunger is spread year-round."

Development forum to focus on upcoming campus construction

The second-annual fall forum of the Campus Development Committee is expected to focus on upcoming K-State capital improvement projects.

The forum, at 3:30 p.m. Tuesday in the Union Big 12 Room, will focus on several upcoming projects, like the proposed Alumni Center, Fiedler Hall, the Grain Science complex, bikeway and sidewalk plans, and the addition to Ackert Hall.

The forum is open to the public. "It's kind of an update on what's going on around campus," said Dick Hayer, chairman of the development committee.

Other topics of discussion are the new master-planning document, a review of the fiscal year 2000 five- and 10-year capital requests, an update on crumbling classroom projects, and the development of the five-year capital requests for fiscal year 2001.

Department of Facilities staff plan to have display boards of architectural and site plans for upcoming projects on display at the forum.

Escaped inmate nears 3 days without food

HUNTSVILLE, Texas — Authorities scoured snake-infested woods and creekbeds Sunday for an escaped death row inmate, confident that he was still on prison property and getting hungrier by the hour.

Ever since Martin E. Gurule dodged prison guards' assault-rifle fire and scaled two razor-crowned fences Friday, helicopters, trucks and dogs have been used to comb more than 17,000 swampy, wooded state-owned acres surrounding the prison.

Texas Department of Criminal Justice officials said they were certain that three days without food would force him to move from his hiding place.

"He just passed 48 hours," department spokesman Glen Castlebury said. "If he's laying down, he's not doing a great deal of movement, exertion, so he is conserving his strength. For an able-bodied man, 48 hours without food, you are coming up on the time you will expect him to start moving."

Gurule, 29, was sentenced to death for shooting Minnie "Mike" Piperis on Oct. 12, 1992, during a robbery at a restaurant Piperis owned with his brother, George. Gurule also was charged with killing restaurant worker Anthony Staton, but that case never went to trial.

Prison officials said Gurule and six other death row inmates escaped late Thanksgiving evening from a recreation yard fence by cutting a fence with a hacksaw, which has yet to be recovered.

They waited for more than three hours atop the Ellis I Unit's flat-topped roof before making a run for the fences at about 12:15 a.m. Friday. As Gurule hit the second of the two fences circling the prison, a motion detector was set off and tower guards made out the moving bodies in heavy fog and began shooting. No one was hit.

The rifle blasts stopped six other

K-State junior elected to FFA national office

By SHANDA PARKER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It started with a dream eight years ago.

With hard work along the way, Andy Armbruster accomplished his goal. Armbruster, junior in agriculture economics, recently was selected the 1998-99 National Central Region vice president of the National FFA Organization.

"The whole concept of being a national officer is building young people," Armbruster said. "I hope to provide some vision for our organization and be a part of a team that brings our organization forward."

FFA is an organization with more than 450,000 members that develops skills of leadership, personal growth and career success through agricultural education.

During the 71st National FFA Convention in Kansas City, Mo., earlier this month, Armbruster had seven rounds of interviews, along with 34 other candidates. The interviews ranged in topics from agricultural issues to personality profiles.

Armbruster prepared throughout the year for the interviews with the help of several people. Mary Kane, executive secretary of Kansas FFA Association; Brad Montgomery, junior in agricultural economics; and Abra Ungeheuer, junior in agricultural economics, all helped Armbruster prepare by setting up interviews with businesses in Kansas and the College of Agriculture and at workshops in area high schools.

"We really tried to put it at the level the interviews would be at during convention and give Andy a feel for what it is going to be like," Ungeheuer said.

Armbruster ran in 1997 for a national FFA office but was not selected. He said he was determined to try again — he wanted to give something back to FFA.

"I had the opportunity to run again, and I thought K-State and my friends will be here when I get back," Armbruster said. "Not to run because I was afraid of getting beat, it is a pretty stupid reason — I couldn't turn down the opportunity."

Ungeheuer said Armbruster took the challenge of running again and that it says a lot about him as a person.

"He took a whole new approach this year," Ungeheuer said. "A big reason he ran again is because it has been a goal of his for eight years. Once he didn't get elected, he had time to step back from the organization and realize he really wanted to serve."

Armbruster said he wants to use his

Programs, counseling offer students tips on healthier eating, snacking habits

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When students leave for college, good nutrition can be a forgotten practice.

"A classic problem when you go away to college is putting on what is called the freshman 15," said Paula Peters, associate professor of foods and nutrition.

K-State dietitians and nutrition experts said there are many keys to avoiding weight gain. Lafene Health Center offers K-State students help and advice on how to lose weight and prevent weight gain.

Dianna Schalles, director of nutrition services at Lafene, counsels people of all ages on eating right.

"I saw a person who said she gained 25 pounds since her freshman year in high school," Schalles said.

Schalles said a lot of college students put on weight because their lifestyles change.

"The typical scenario that I see is that someone who's been real active in high school, someone who has been involved in all these sports and different athletics, and then they come to college and just drop it all," Schalles said. "So the physical inactivity a lot of times leads to weight gain."

Peters said a lot of students have difficulty making healthy choices when selecting food to eat.

"The first time away at school, freshman go wild with all of the snack foods out there," Peters said.

Shaquanta Jones, freshman in physical therapy, said she keeps cookies, chips and Jell-O in her room. Jones said she often considers buying pizza, but doesn't because it is too expensive and frivolous.

Peters suggests people who live in the residence halls consider healthier foods such as carrots to keep in their rooms.

She stressed the importance of physical activity and said she suggests joining an intramural team.

Peters also said to make positive choices when selecting foods to eat in the residence halls, and students should follow the food guide pyramid when choosing which foods to eat.

Peters said the dining centers can be criticized unfairly, but she believes they provide healthy choices.

Deah Robinson, freshman in psychology, said she has been unable to acquire a taste for food from Derby Dining Center.

"I really don't like the Derby food, so I just snack a lot, and I eat like eight times a day," Robinson said.

Schalles said students should plan their meals around their schedules and break them down so they are eating lighter meals more frequently.

Jones said eating healthy in the Kramer Food Center isn't that difficult.

"I don't think it's hard to eat healthy. I work at Kramer, and we have the salad bar all the time," Jones said.

The Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex offers free counseling and programs to anyone with access to the Rec Complex. It has a variety of programs, such as having clients fill out a three-day food record, to help those interested in working on their dietary habits.

It also conducts physical tests, but fitness consultant Ryan Manning said none of the Rec Complex's tests or programs are forced on clients.

"We pretty much do what they want us to do," Manning said. "We listen to their goals, and then we kind of tailor a program to meet their goals."

There are three things that contribute to good health: cardiovascular conditioning, weight training and proper diet, Manning said.

"All three of those things combined is what makes a person healthy for as long

OUR VIEW

KATS speeds up enrollment process

Remember Ahearn Field House at fee-payment time? The noisy cavern filled with students who were spending their afternoons out of class wasting away in the intense heat of a Kansas summer or the chill of a bitter winter, languishing on their feet in a serpentine line that stretched to fill the emptiness?

That's what Ahearn's other purpose was, apart from basketball, apart from volleyball, apart from the screaming fans and Jack Hartman and Wednesday and Saturday nights — Ahearn was for fee payment.

There is really no way of glorifying Ahearn for that purpose. It wasn't half as well suited to fee payment as our other current options — mail-in fee payment, for instance, is much more organized than it ever was at Ahearn.

Progress behaves that way, though, and as fee payment progressed to a more organized system, enrollment has as well. The lines in Willard Hall are shrinking, and this is largely due to KATS, the K-State Access Technology System. The university has provided this tool to cut down the time we spend enrolling to mere minutes. The progression from Willard and its lines to the convenience of a personal computer in such a short time must seem like a miracle to some of our more-seasoned students. It really is a bit of a miracle — cutting enrollment time from half a day to half an hour.

That isn't to say that using KATS is flawless. Many chose not to because of fears that enrollment wouldn't be as official unless they did it in person. This fear is, for the most part, unfounded, but such worries are common with any new system. Our hope is that the success KATS saw this semester will persuade other students to use it for their enrollment as well.

Some, however, were dissuaded by the price tag. This past semester, KATS users were asked to pay a $4 fee to enroll using the system. The registrar's office, however, has given its assurance that this fee will end sometime in the near future — it is necessary only to pay the state back for the system. Additionally, as more and more people begin using KATS, the university will have less and less need for the employees who enroll students from Willard. As they are released, more money will be available to offset the cost of KATS, and that will diminish the amount students pay.

Of course, the price is easy to digest in the face of such convenience, and it is difficult to find many conveniences in college that don't have a fee attached. To a certain extent, that's the burden we bear for our education.

One burden we should not be required to bear, however, is that of slow service and of our incapability to log on to a system because it is too saturated with other people trying to log on. There were several occasions during the past enrollment period that the system was jammed with students to the exclusion of others.

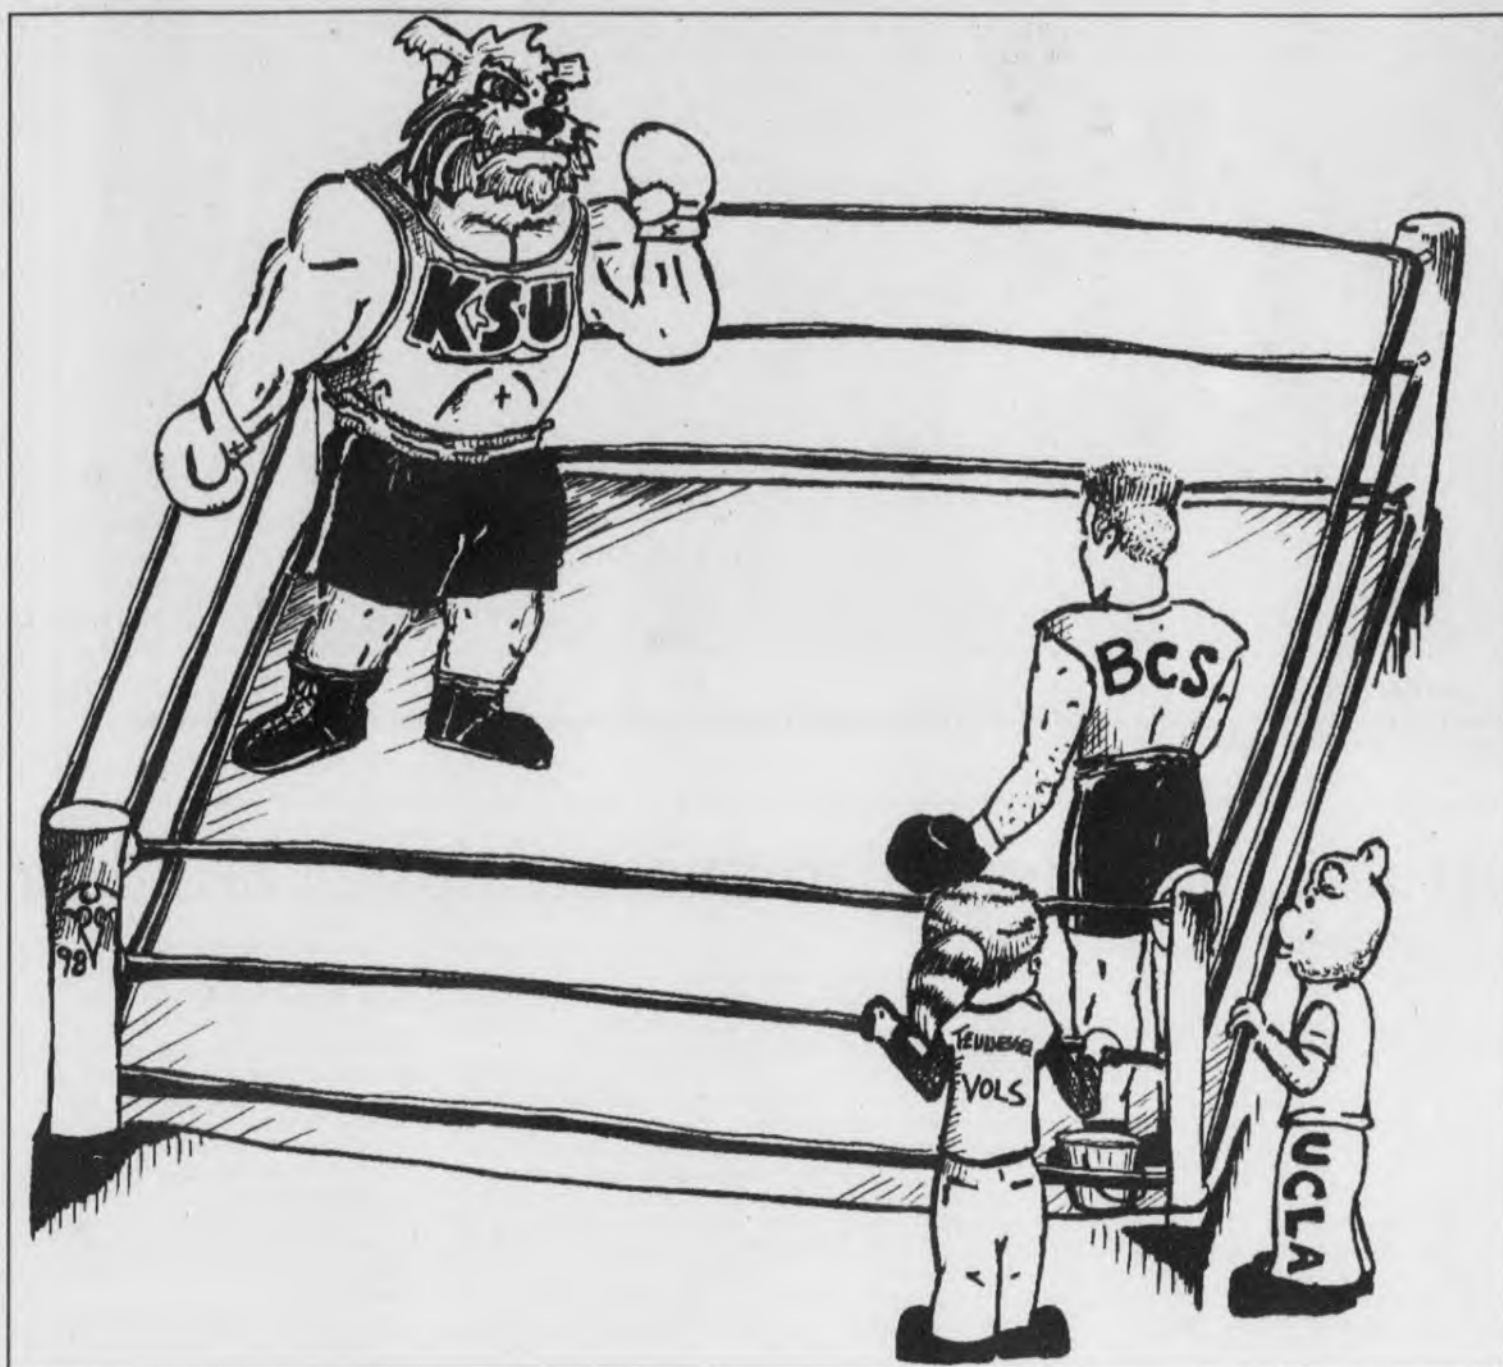

We believe that the tie-up was caused by the new system the Office of the Registrar adopted for spreading-out enrollment days. Too many people tried to enroll as soon as their days came due in an attempt to obtain all of their classes. Instead of finding the networks clear at 8 a.m. as they sat in front of their computers, they found every other student at K-State in their enrollment group trying to enroll at the same time. Had the registrar's office adopted the old plan of enrollment by credit hours, there would be a better distribution of students with enrollment priority, diminishing the competition for credit hours and releasing the network from any tie-ups created under our current system.

That, and the old enrollment system was much more fair.

Nonetheless, KATS already has helped to make our lives more convenient. After this semester, advisers should become more aware of what KATS has to offer and should recommend KATS to their advisees. Students should be ready for other services that will be offered on the KATS network, and they should familiarize themselves with the system so that when the time comes when they are purchasing parking permits and Royal Purple yearbooks by computer, they will be ready.

Mom, son undergo role reversal for graduation day

VIEWPOINT

CORBIN CRABLE

With more than 20,000 students at our university, it is quite easy to overlook those students who play a more indirect role in the academic life of our school.

Students in the Distance Learning Program are to be commended for their hard work and dedication to this university. While they are not present on campus, they work for the common goal of everyone who attends K-State — better living through academics. They work in the comfort of their own homes and study just as much, if not more, than we do.

My mother is one of them. Mom attended K-State in the 1970s, majoring in family studies and human services. She met my dad, who was drafted into the U.S. Army and was stationed as a policeman in Germany for a year, after which they returned to school. A marriage and pregnancy later (with yours truly), Mom dropped out of school during the second semester of her senior year.

For 20 years, this proverbial loose end has remained in the back of her mind. Mom always wanted to go back to school but promised she wouldn't do so until her kids were grown and out of the house.

Now, she has her chance. Mom enrolled last semester in the Distance Learning Program, which allows students to take K-State classes via video and mail-in exam. Whoever thought this up has my nomination for sainthood. After all, any class that would allow students to attend lectures in their pajamas and house slippers while laying on the sofa with a cup of coffee can't be all that bad.

The way I see it, anyone who has the dedication and the motivation to finish a degree after such a long time deserves it. One of the things I admire about Mom is her desire to finish what she began. After she receives her degree on Dec. 12, she will attend the University of Kansas next fall (OK, so nobody's perfect) and work for her master's degree. Watch out, KU. You'll have another Wildcat to deal with soon.

Part of the credit, meanwhile, goes to the Distance Learning Program for making it convenient for long-distance K-State students to finish their degrees.

Besides a few test date mix-ups, I don't believe I've ever heard Mom speak of any discrepancy in the program. The efficiency of this program makes it convenient for students to keep up in their classes while maintaining their busy schedules at home.

At any rate, Mom is continuing something that she hasn't taken part in since the Carter administration. How many people can say they're this successful, coming back to college after 20 years and obtaining a respectable grade point average? Yes, in the GPA department, I still have much to learn from her.

So, next week, Mom's bachelor's degree finally will be hers, and she'll be a step closer to achieving her dreams. For her hard work, I salute her; the highly effective Distance Learning Program definitely has made this dream more of a reality. Next week will be an emotional one, with all of Mom's old friends (and K-State grads) from the fourth floor B-wing of West Hall in attendance. Now, I'm pretty sure I'll be the misty-eyed one, watching Mom as she strides across that stage to get her degree, all the while taking pictures and turning to others, saying, "That's my mother right there." Ah, role reversals.

Congratulations, Mom. I'm proud of you and love you very much.

Graduation approaches, or at least that's what they tell me

VIEWPOINT

MARY RENEE SMITH

Apparently, I am graduating from the College of Human Ecology.

The problem is I am not now, nor have I ever been, a student in the College of Human Ecology. I did take one class in Justin Hall — Introduction to Human Development. I got a D, which might stand for Diploma after all.

I'm pretty excited. After four years of college and tens of thousands of dollars in student financial aid, I actually might graduate from K-State. Well, I might get to walk across the stage in a dress and a funny hat, but I don't think I will get a degree of any kind.

In reality, I am nowhere near graduation from any school or college on this or any other campus. Although I have taken a number of classes in my major (speech), I am lacking in a few of the general education requirements for liberal arts majors.

Nevertheless, a week or so ago, I received a packet of information from the College of Human Ecology congratulating me on my impending graduation. If you are graduating, you have received a packet of this kind.

Inside the medium-sized manila envelope was a new graduate report the KSU Alumni Association wants me to fill out, a letter from the vice provost explaining why I have to pay a non-refundable $15 graduation fee, commencement instructions, transcript request procedure and a little blue piece of paper explaining what I will need to do to continue to take classes at K-State after I graduate.

The kicker is the cover letter, which appears to be hand-signed by the dean, Carol Kellett. The letter begins this way:

"Congratulations! You are nearing the completion of your college degree, and we in the College of Human Ecology are very proud of you."

How nice of them to be proud of me for a degree I have not earned. The letter continues to explain the time and place of commencement and to invite me and my family to a banquet. I'm sure my family would love to come.

I especially like the way the letter ends: "The faculty members of the College of Human Ecology join me in wishing you great success in your future endeavors."

I checked the K-State people finder to see if by chance there is another Mary Renee Smith on campus with whom the college might have confused me. Nope, I am the only one.

On one hand, I find all of this kind of humorous. On the other hand, it is quite painful. Due to a number of circumstances, some of them my fault and others completely out of my control, I am not graduating any time soon. I have poured thousands of dollars into my higher education, and the end is nowhere in sight.

Opening this packet of graduation information was like having all these years of failure rubbed in my face. For a moment, I wondered if I could sue the university for pain and suffering.

The other thing that really ticked me off was that the dean of the College of Human Ecology doesn't know that I'm not a graduate in her college. Not that I expect the dean of every college to know every graduate, but I would hope there would be some kind of personal touch.

If the day ever comes and I graduate, I would like to feel that my college takes the time to find out who I am. If it ever hopes I will give it any money, it had better take the time to find out about me.

When I was shopping for a university, I was worried about coming to a school as big as K-State. I was worried I would get lost in the crowd and become just a number. I guess was right.

The university can't keep track of who is graduating and who is not, but it sure can keep track of when I owe them money. The college can't send out graduation information to the correct people, but it is sure to include all the information about how much it will cost to graduate.

I have not been reduced to a number. I have been reduced to a dollar sign.

Cats come back from Hawaii, struggle to 78-71 victory

By JON BALMER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

Call it a holiday hangover. Coming off a three-game stint in Hawaii over Thanksgiving break, the men's basketball team struggled to a 78-71 victory against Georgia State on Sunday at Bramlage Coliseum.

From the start, the Cats appeared to leave their offensive rhythm overseas, committing nine first-half turnovers. K-State also failed to contain GSU guard Anton Reese, who exploded for 38 points and nine three-pointers.

The few bright spots for K-State were turned in by junior transfers Cortez Groves and Tony Kitt, who contributed 21 points apiece.

With senior forward Manny Dies sitting out for the game due to a late arrival at the pregame meal, K-State head coach Tom Asbury tried a variety of line-ups while searching for a solid unit. Unable to establish a sustained attack, the Cats built a small lead on perfect free-throw shooting (12-12) and entered halftime with a 36-28 lead.

Beginning the second half with the inside tandem of Groves, Kitt and Shawn Rhodes, the Cats put together a 12-3 run in the first four minutes to go up 48-31.

With a blowout victory looming on the horizon, the Panthers stayed alive, due in part to Reese's long-range shooting, and pieced together a 10-0 run midway through the half to cut the lead to

Asbury's squad defeats Georgia State after going 1-2 at Maui Invitational

55-50.

Able to weather Reese's long bombs and keep composure after shot clock problems forced two delays, K-State used solid play by Groves down the stretch and steady free-throw shooting to seal the 7-point victory.

After the game, Asbury said Dies would play in the Cats' next game, but his pregame decision came at a costly time.

"Manny's a senior, and this is a crucial year for him," Asbury said, "and if I were him, I'd be disappointed to have to sit out a game."

Without Dies' defensive presence, the Cats failed to contain Reese, who entered the contest with a sore back. Ironically, Asbury sent his chiropractor to treat Reese before the game, something the coach joked about afterward.

Although the Cats' defensive pressure wasn't the best of their young season, Kitt said that wasn't the only reason Reese posted big numbers.

"He could shoot the lights out," Kitt said.

"For us, it was just a matter of if we could contain him. I thought it would be a blowout, but he just kept hitting shots."

With the victory leaving K-State at 5-2, Kitt said the Cats could improve on many things at this stage of the season.

"Conditioning, for one," he said. "There's a couple guys on the team not in the best of shape."

"For the most part, we've just got to mold and gel together."

The victory ended a busy month for the team. K-State finished sixth at the Maui Invitational after going 1-2. The Cats began with a 71-70 loss to then-No. 21 Indiana after surrendering a 16-point halftime lead.

The team bounced back with an 84-

80 overtime victory against Arizona State, which featured a 19-rebound performance by Kitt — a Maui Invitational record — but ended on a down note with a loss to No. 22 Clemson, 79-45.

The steady flow of early competition forced the Cats to learn on the court, something Asbury said took a toll on the entire team.

"This has been a cram session for our new guys, and it's almost been a cram session for our veterans," he said. "They're not used to this little preparation. Combine that with the fact we're still in November and we've played seven games."

K-State's December schedule begins Tuesday with a home contest against Loyola-Chicago. Tipoff is at 7 p.m.

RUN for GLORY

Amanda Crouse charges for the finish of the NCAA national cross country championships Nov. 23 in Lawrence. Crouse finished 106th with a time of 18:18.18. The women's team finished 13th overall in the meet.

Women's squad places 13th at NCAA Championships, sophomore Brandon Jessop finishes 97th in men's race

After a Big 12 Conference title and a Midwest Regional Championship, the K-State cross country squad kept its hunger for success alive at the NCAA Championships on Nov. 23.

Proving it could compete against top-ranked competition, the women's team raced to a 13th-place finish at Rim Rock Farm in Lawrence.

"We finished better than we were ranked," sophomore Annie Wetterhus said. "You have to be happy with that. We could have easily been in the top 10, but some of us just didn't have our best days."

Sophomore Korene Hinds paced the Wildcats with a 27th-place finish with a time of 17:30. Freshman Katerina Fotopoulou took 83rd, and freshman Amanda Crouse and Wetterhus were close behind, placing 106th and 113th, respectively.

"Korene Hinds ran extremely well," head coach Randy Cole said. "Katerina also stepped it up today in a big way."

"In this kind of race, everybody counts, and our people were fairly poised for a big event."

K-State's only representative in the men's race, sophomore Brandon Jessop, placed 97th. Coming off a third-place finish in the Midwest Regional Championships, Jessop began the race slowly by falling down midway through the event.

"Brandon ran well and really battled back after falling," Cole said. "I was pleased with his performance. Overall, the future looks really good for the Kansas State Wildcats."

The second-ranked Villanova Wildcats grabbed the women's title in a field packed with NCAA powerhouses.

"The national meet is the toughest collegiate meet," Wetterhus said. "It starts fast and it stays fast."

Despite racing in an event with more than 200 runners, Wetterhus said it wasn't hard to keep up the pace.

"Surprisingly, we were still able to find each other during the race," she said. "It was kind of hard trying to fight your way out of the pack. You just have to focus on yourself."

She said K-State was prepared for the national meet.

"I think the previous meets prepared us for nationals," she said. "The Big 12 really gets you ready for nationals."

"We are definitely a national-caliber team."

The women's NCAA performance tops off a season that featured its first Big 12 crown and four first-place titles.

"We have had a great season and a consistent one at that," Cole said. "Throughout the year, if one person runs bad, the other picks up the slack. It has helped us through the season."

Wetterhus said this season has been a shock to the Wildcats.

"We knew we would be good, but we didn't know how good we would be," she said. "We had a great season, going out and finishing 13th in the nation. That is something to be proud of."

By getting their top-five runners back next year, the Wildcats might duplicate this year's success next season.

"This year has set the standards for next year," Wetterhus said.

Brandon Jessop labors through the course Nov. 23 at the NCAA national cross country meet at Rim Rock Farm in Lawrence. Jessop was the lone male runner for the Cats and finished 97th overall with a time of 32:06.00 in the 10,000-meter race.

Chiefs stop losing streak at 6 games

■ Chiefs move to 5-7 with 34-24 win against Arizona.

By DOUG TUCKER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — It was just like old times at Arrowhead Stadium.

The Kansas City Chiefs ran the ball with authority and scored points. They took the ball away several times.

And, most importantly from their point of view, it was not like recent times — they won a game.

A week after scoring 37 points against San Diego, the Chiefs put up 34 on Sunday against Arizona.

But this time, instead of surrendering a 17-point lead and losing 38-37, the defense held on for a 34-24 victory that snapped their six-game losing streak.

"Take care of the ball, run the ball with some effectiveness," said Coach Marty Schottenheimer, who had never had a six-game losing streak. "You take the ball away. Then you've got a chance to win a lot of football games. That's been our blueprint in the past. Unfortunately over the past six weeks we've been disappointed."

Derrick Alexander, who caught five passes for 173 yards the previous week at San Diego, had six catches for 116 yards and two TDs to become the first Kansas City receiver in four years with back-to-back 100-yard games.

Bam Morris, making his second straight start at running back, rushed 15 times for 76 yards and a touchdown as the Chiefs totaled 128 yards on the ground.

Artists & Landscapes

Kansas prairie endlessly fascinates artists

An art show featuring the work of Dixie Lee Westerman (left), Rodney Troth, Stan Herd and Glenda Taylor opened Friday evening at the Columbian Theatre, Museum and Art Center in Wamego. The show runs through Jan. 17.

STEVEN DEARINGER / COLLEGIAN

By RUSSELL FORTMEYER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Having nearly put the last lingering remnants of summer to bed, the Kansas prairie has transformed into a seemingly endless yellow vista of dormant grasses under brisk blue skies.

Perhaps it takes an artist — a person with refined sensibilities and a solid curiosity — to remind us this fallow prairie is bursting at the seams with subtle color and rolling forms that have become more evident with the recession of leaves and tall weeds.

Five of Kansas' more interesting landscape artists — Stan Herd, Dan Kirchhefer, Glenda Taylor, Rodney Troth, and Dixie Lee Westerman — celebrate this state's No. 1 resource in a show at Wamego's Columbian Theatre, Museum and Art Center until Jan. 17.

Although some of those names might be more familiar than others, this show has a place for everyone. With more than 50 pieces, this show provides ample examples of each artist's work, which are offered for sale. Curator Margaret Buie, who said she organized the show simply because she wanted to do a landscape show, has a knack for bringing together artists who normally don't show in these parts.

Take Taylor, head of the art department at Washburn University, and her earthenware mini-landscapes of her "Prairie Memories" series. Local sculptors have taken on simple landscapes before, but never quite in this exuberant manner. One of her two-piece wall pieces, "Waves" (1995), reverberates like a Thomas Hart Benton landscape with a stylized cup-nadic cup dancing along its tilting surfaces.

Other pieces, such as the orange "Whirlpool" (1996), appear soft and strangely alien.

"Whirlpool" takes on an otherness — not to sound too abstract — for it's a three-dimensional interpretation of a landscape. Yet, it's so obviously not a landscape, but perhaps a thought-of-a-place experience.

Remembering a childhood experience with a tornado, Taylor said, "Reality is what your mind makes it." She said most of her work is of particular places, ideas and memories, but not necessarily representative.

If that is true, and the artist seems to confirm this, Taylor has convincingly and brilliantly linked place and memory — a rare achievement.

Another artist known almost singularly for his associations with place and place transformation, Herd is Kansas' resident "big artist." A man who has organized projects in New York and London, he's best known in Kansas for his monumentally scaled earthworks where he designs fields to ape famous art or people.

In the Columbian show, his work is best represented by "Comanche County," oil on canvas (1998), a dark work that seems painted with light. A heavy purple lends weight to the landscape, and accents of pink and orange fluorescents give it spontaneity. A smaller companion piece, "December Landscape," oil on canvas (1998), has short, dynamic strips of color in the form of a row of trees at a slight angle that is reminiscent of Van Gogh.

The strips of color that Herd uses to construct his paintings are undoubtedly connected to the strips of grasses and field crops the artist uses in his large environmental works. One of those works, "Countryside — New York," a Kansas landscape placed under an elevated highway in New York City, is shown in a photograph.

"The earthworks are so overwhelmingly labor-intensive, they wear me out," Herd said. "The painting, you are having fun."

Kirchhefer, who recently enjoyed a show at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art as a Friends of Art gift-print artist, shows his characteristic studies of the complex architectonics of limestone cliffs in the Flint Hills. His view, that of the detail rather than full scope of the landscape, is an appreciation of the slight fissures and meandering lines that define the layers of soft rock.

In "Near Dover," oil on canvas (1998), a minimal use of paint and brushstroke is used to convey irregular landscape forms. Troth walks a line between the earthbound reality of the landscape and the subtle spirituality present in nature.

"This is definitely the single most powerful place on earth to paint," Troth said. "Kansas is one of those places that has an underlying structure, but I don't think anyone is painting it."

"THIS IS DEFINITELY THE SINGLE MOST POWERFUL PLACE ON EARTH TO PAINT. KANSAS IS ONE OF THOSE PLACES THAT HAS AN UNDERLYING STRUCTURE, BUT I DON'T THINK ANYONE IS PAINTING IT."

— RODNEY TROTH

Bad Livers shows depth, variety in latest CD release

By AMY MILLER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Review

out of 5 stars

One of the best things about Bad Livers is that just when someone tries to pin a label on the group, it goes back into the studio and mixes things up. Such is the case with "Industry and Thrift," the duo's latest compact disc.

Longtime Livers fans have to listen to this one with an open mind. With Mark Rubin on bass, accordion and tuba, and songwriter Danny Barnes on banjo and guitar, Bad Livers still plays lightning-fast bluegrass. However, this CD also includes rock, ragtime and klezmer.

"I'm Goin' Back to Mom and Dad" is the closest this CD comes to the required "Momma" bluegrass song. The small-town boy is heading home as Barnes sings, "I'm going back to Mom and Dad and my own feather bed. City lights have left me broken and tangled up my head."

Barnes wrote the soundtrack and Rubin served as music supervisor for this year's movie "The Newton Boys." Maybe they were motivated to include a 1920s-inspired song on "Industry" after making period music for the film. Maybe bad experiences in Los Angeles inspired "Hollywood Blues," another tune about a guy who wants to be somewhere else. Whatever the reason, Barnes just sounds tired of the whole scene as he sings, "I'm leavin' here on the first light of day. It ain't too clear, all the things they make you say." This laid-back song lingers, but at 7:32, maybe it lingers a bit too long.

Though it's a departure from the "I'm out of here" theme, "Doin' My Time" is a challenge to the traditionalist's ear. This chain-gang lament, written by Jimmie Skinner and recorded by Lester Platt and Earl Scruggs in 1950, is converted here into plugged-in rock 'n' roll. Coincidentally, Bad Livers once was known for playing bluegrass covers of metal tunes by such bands as Motorhead and Metallica at its live shows.

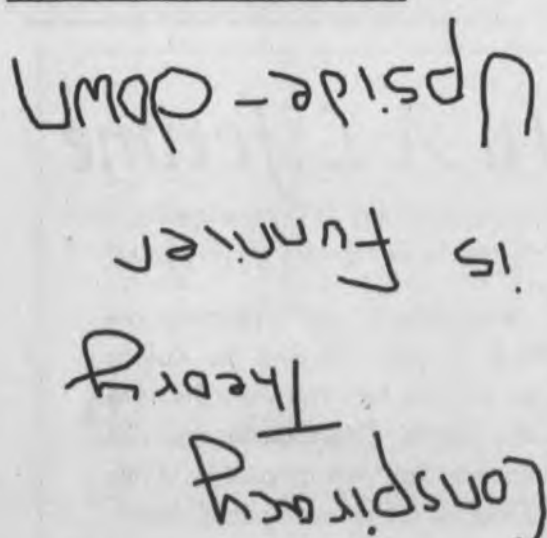

With the exception of "Hogs on the Highway" from 1997, Bad Livers usually ends its CDs with soulful melodies. "Industry," however, closes with the beautiful "Anna Lee." In fact, it would linger in listeners' heads for days, if it weren't for the upbeat hidden track that follows. Nevertheless, Rubin plays a quiet accordion harmony to Barnes' acoustic guitar melody, and anyone who has disappointed a loved one might want to grab a hanky for this one: "Tears will fall, and hearts are broken. Hold me, darling, keep your daddy warm."

Though Bad Livers has been reduced from a trio to a duo, nothing is lacking on "Industry and Thrift."

The members are proficient on several instruments each and are smart enough to surround themselves in the studio with talented friends to fill in any gaps. Though the three rock 'n' roll songs are hard for this bluegrass fan to appreciate, "Industry" is brilliant overall.

U.S. district judge, wife found shot to death

By JENNY PRICE
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MISSION, Kan. — U.S. District Judge Earl O'Connor and his wife were found shot to death in their home Sunday, and authorities said it appeared the two were alone at the time of the shootings.

Police found O'Connor, 76, and his 66-year-old wife, Jean Ann, dead of apparent gunshot wounds about 8:55 a.m., said Jeff Lanza, spokesman for the FBI in Kansas City, Mo.

Lanza said a nurse who made regular visits to the couple's home contacted a relative after there was no answer at the O'Connor home. The relative then contacted police, who discovered the bodies in a bedroom of their home in Mission, which is a suburb of Kansas City, Mo.

He said there was no sign of forced entry, and he did not know why the nurse had been visiting the home. The O'Connors were last seen about 8 p.m. Saturday, Lanza said.

"The initial investigation would not lead one to conclude that a third person was involved," Lanza said.

He said it appeared that the judge and his wife had each been shot once but that an autopsy was scheduled to determine the exact cause of death.

"Neither had been shot in the head," Lanza said.

"Who shot who ... we cannot determine at this point in time," Lanza told CBS. "We're going to have to rely on a coroner to give us a post-mortem examination."

He said one gun was found in the bedroom, but he would not say if authorities also found a note. He also would not say what type of gun was used.

Asked if it appeared to be a murder-suicide, Lanza said, "I'm not going to comment on that. We are not labeling this until the autopsy has been completed."

The FBI and the Mission police department were handling the investigation.

U.S. District Judge G. Thomas VanBebber, who had known O'Connor since 1960 when VanBebber was an assistant U.S. attorney and O'Connor was a state district judge, said O'Connor was in good health, extremely active and enjoyed playing golf.

"That's why we're so shocked and devastated," he said.

However, VanBebber said O'Connor's wife had been "quite ill recently and had been in poor health. I think that stressed the judge considerably."

VanBebber said O'Connor took senior status five or six years ago, a designation that permits federal judges to reduce their caseload.

"He still came to the courthouse every day and carried a substantial caseload," VanBebber said.

"I don't know of anyone who had really worked harder in furtherance of the administration of justice through the court system than Judge O'Connor. He was always dedicated to that."

Tom and Tanya Johnston, the O'Connors' next-door neighbors for the last five years, said the judge and his wife were considerate neighbors.

"They were just really sweet, wonderful people," said Tanya Johnston. "They brought us Christmas presents every year. They were very giving. Really, the best neighbors you could ask for."

They said since Judge O'Connor had taken senior status, the couple had done a lot of traveling.

Other neighbors said they had seen the nurse visiting the house, but they did not know the nature of Jean Ann O'Connor's illness.

O'Connor was appointed federal judge in October 1971. His most recent case involved The Woodlands Race Track's reorganization plan. In October, O'Connor upheld a bankruptcy court's decision to reject The Woodland's reorganization plan and ordered the sale of the greyhound and horse racing facility.

He ruled that U.S. Bankruptcy Judge John T. Flannagan had properly rejected The Woodlands' plan to emerge from bankruptcy in partnership with an Indian-owned casino.

Flannagan had ruled earlier this year that the plan had little chance of succeeding and was unfair to the creditors.

O'Connor also tried a 1975 desegregation lawsuit filed against the Kansas City, Kan., school district by the U.S. Department of Justice.

Architecture students work on interior design for proposed building

By GABE ECKERT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Thirty-three fourth-year interior architecture students have been working since September to develop a floor plan and interior design for a proposed building to house the Kansas Highway Patrol.

The project is part of an interior architecture class that is team-taught by Vicky Borchers, assistant professor of interior architecture, and Gwen Owens-Wilson, associate professor of interior architecture.

"The goal of the class is to get a real client involved so students can deal directly with many of the issues that are difficult to simulate in the classroom," Borchers said. "This project takes learning out of the hypothetical and roots it in a real-world environment."

Students have worked with representatives from the KHP to design a 60,000-square-foot floor plan — one floor of a four-floor building.

The proposed building will be at the southwest corner of the Statehouse in Topeka, at the corner of 10th and Harrison streets; funds for the project still are waiting approval.

To complete the project, students first examined the client's needs, Borchers said. They then drew a diagram of the employee-working relationships within the building in order to draft a floor plan and interior design. The final step is to present their proposal to the client.

"The students enjoy working for a real client," Borchers said. "Because the project is real, they have an increased amount of satisfaction in completing it."

The KHP likely will use a combination of student plans, Borchers said. The project provides a valuable learning experience, said Staci Schuette, senior in interior architecture.

"It's really nice to have a client that is not someone from the department," she said.

"In the past, we've had classes where our professor acts as the client, but the feedback they give us isn't as valuable as feedback from a real client. Feedback from a client is from a professional perspective."

By working with the KHP and investing an average of more than 400 hours in the project, students develop teamwork skills and learn how to deal on a professional level, Schuette said.

"This project gives us an incentive to work toward something that someone other than our teacher values," she said.

"We are working for more than just a grade."

17 remain hospitalized after bus crash in Seattle

By JOHN M. HUBBELL
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SEATTLE — The hunched-over man at the bus stop made Chad Reilly nervous. He ripped away the paper bag that cradled his liquor with a flourish, looking Reilly in the eye as he approached.

"He was talking to himself, obviously kind of out of it," said Reilly, who decided not to linger and made his way to another bus stop.

Reilly's description of the man matches that of Steven Gary Coole, considered a possible suspect in the shooting death of a city bus driver Friday. The bus, carrying 35 people, fell 50 feet off a bridge.

Three people — including the gunman — died, and 32 people were injured. Seventeen remained hospitalized Sunday, with one man in critical condition. Reilly, who got on the bus at a later stop, escaped the crash with minor cuts and bruises.

Police would not confirm that Coole shot the driver. Ballistics results, expected Monday, could identify the gun that killed driver Mark McLaughlin, 44, who died of several gunshot wounds to the abdomen, police spokeswoman Christie-Lynne Bonner said.

Police said the possible gunman was found near the bus with an apparent self-inflicted gunshot wound to the head and a fired gun nearby.

A second handgun — unfired — was recovered from the dead passenger's body at Harborview Medical Center, where he was pronounced dead Friday.

The third victim, passenger Herman Liebelt, 69, died Saturday of head injuries and a pelvic fracture.

Coole, who reportedly used the alias Silas Cool, is believed to be from North Plainfield, N.J., 25 miles west of New York City.

A man who answered the telephone of D.R. Cool, believed to be the New Jersey residence of Coole's family, refused to comment.

In Seattle, two portraits of the man believed to be Coole emerged. One was of a man seeking redemption in a crowded homeless shelter; the other was Reilly's description of an angry, alcohol-swilling man waiting for a bus.

Bill Wippel of Seattle's Union Gospel Mission said he identified Coole for detectives from a photograph. Wippel said the man had come to the mission twice in the last month, seeking food, shelter and prayer. Coole had asked to be placed on a waiting list for a bed in the downtown mission, but he never received one, Wippel said.

Coole was well-behaved, and to Wippel, the tall, curly-haired man didn't look violent — just someone reaching out for help.

Like Reilly, Wippel was quickly and vividly able to recall the man.

"I do remember him in chapel," Wippel said.

"He was well dressed. You pick people out like that because (they) stand out."

Sharing your engagement and wedding announcements in the Collegian the first Friday of every month

Your engagement and wedding are special moments in your life and the Kansas State Collegian wants to help you share the news with family and friends. This semester you can put your announcement with a picture in the Collegian's "Once in a Lifetime" special section for FREE.

"Once in a Lifetime" runs the first Friday of every month: Oct. 3, Nov. 6 and Dec. 4. It will resume in the spring semester with the following publication dates: Feb. 5, March 5, April 2 and May 7.

To publish your announcement, please complete the attached form and mail it or take it to Student Publications, Kedzie 103 (east of the K-State Student Union). The deadline for getting your announcement in the paper will be the Wednesday preceding the publication date.

1998 hurricane season will go down in history books

By JOHN PACENTI
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MIAMI — This year's Atlantic hurricane season, an onslaught of storms that left a staggering trail of death and destruction across Central America and the Caribbean, won't be soon forgotten.

Six of the named storms — including the season's monsters, Georges and Mitch — affected the continental United States and caused millions in damage.

The season, which started June 1, winds up today after racking up the deadliest toll in more than 200 years.

More of the same is possible next year, said pioneering hurricane forecaster William Gray at Colorado State University in Fort Collins, Colo.

"We are going to see the return of some of these type of storms," Gray said. "People have to face up to it. The insurance industry has a major problem."

Gray, who underestimated this season's activity, said the last four years have been the most active ever for hurricanes in the Atlantic basin.

He expects even more hurricanes in 1999.

With the gradual fading of the latest cycle of the El Niño phenomenon, which tends to suppress Atlantic hurricanes, 1998 saw nine hurricanes and five tropical storms. In September, there were four hurricanes at once — Georges, Ivan, Jeanne and Karl — for the first time since 1893.

The Pacific hurricane season, which also ends today, was about average with 13 named storms and nine hurricanes.

Howard was the strongest with 150 mph sustained wind. Only Isis reached land, and then only after weakening to tropical storm force.

The Atlantic season's last gasp was Tropical Storm Nicole, which formed

Season officially ends today, death toll highest in more than 200 years

last week and stayed out at sea.

But it was really Mitch that provided the season's climax.

After forming south of Jamaica on Oct. 22, Mitch erupted into a Category 5 storm with sustained wind blowing at 180 mph and gusts estimated at more than 200 mph, the fourth-strongest Caribbean hurricane this century.

Then it stalled over Honduras and Nicaragua with torrents of rain. Its death toll from floods, storm surge and mudslides probably will never be known but is estimated at more than 10,000.

"We have a fear in the community about illnesses from the dead — there are still so many," Cristobal Gradis, 38, a community leader in the hard-hit village of Tololar, Honduras, said earlier this month.

"There's some they wanted to burn, but they didn't burn well. They are stacked on top of the ground. The number is uncountable."

Mitch's death toll would match Fifi, which hit Honduras in 1974, as the third-deadliest Atlantic hurricane.

The deadliest single storm on record was in 1780, killing at least 20,000 people on Martinique. A 1900 storm killed 8,000 to 12,000 at Galveston, Texas.

Mitch proved difficult for forecasters, even though they were equipped this season with a new satellite, a new hurricane-hunter airplane and other high-tech tools.

As the storm headed over Central America, they had to rely mostly on ground-level data to measure the storm's intensity, because they couldn't use their airplane as much as they wished.

"It was a very challenging forecast for us," said Miles Lawrence, a specialist with the National Hurricane Center. "It pointed out some of our limitations. We have a good justification for beefing up observations in Central America."

Mitch even overshadowed Georges, which formed Sept. 15 and grew into a Category 4 storm with 150 mph wind. Georges rampaged across islands, the Florida Keys and the Mississippi Delta, causing about $1 billion in damage and at least 350 deaths in Haiti and the Dominican Republic.

Bonnie grazed North Carolina and Virginia in late August and caused up to $2 billion in damages. Tropical Storm Charley struck Texas on Aug. 22, dumping 18 inches of rain on one small town and killing at least 19 people in Texas and Mexico.

Hurricane Earl hit the Florida Panhandle on Labor Day; a week later, Frances caused floods along the Gulf Coast from Texas to Louisiana.

The vulnerable Florida Keys got hit twice.

Georges damaged an estimated 700 homes on its way to Mississippi.

Many Keys residents had never been through a hurricane before and decided to tough it out, a decision many regretted.

"We weren't prepared for it all," said Jerry Wright, who got a tree through his bedroom window during Mitch. "We thought we were going to meet our makers."

World AIDS Day at the Manhattan Arts Center. His keynote address on campus will be at 7 p.m. Wednesday in Union Forum Hall. Davis also will speak at Manhattan High School on Wednesday as well as three family studies and human ecology classes on Thursday.

Assistant Director of Health Education Reita Currie said that letting people know about AIDS and its causes and treatments will help slow the epidemic.

"Awareness is the key," Currie said. "The disease is happening in Manhattan with people infected with it or people knowing those with the disease."

Currie said that she and STD, HIV, AIDS Peer Educators (SHAPE) are organizing the second Ensure drive, collecting donations to purchase nutritional supplements for AIDS patients. Because of health problems related to the AIDS virus, some of those with the disease can't eat properly or digest food. Ensure, or another nutritional supplement, is not covered by funding because it is not a prescription medication.

Tables will be set up in the K-State Student Union beginning Tuesday, where students can donate $1 to purchase a can of Ensure. This will enter them in a Friday drawing to win a Willie the Wildcat head or a KSU jacket. Donations then will be given to the Regional AIDS project.

"Too often, people around here don't think they will be affected because they are not gay or don't shoot up drugs," Currie said. "We should assist people with the disease and have compassion, treating them not as outcasts."

Another purpose of the committee is to make the community aware that HIV has been spreading faster among minority women.

Fallon said the committee is contacting each of the minority groups on campus, letting them know about the programs and inviting them to have students participate in the SHAPE program. SHAPE trains individuals to teach STD-related information to groups.

"In Africa, the highest rate of infection is in heterosexuals, not homosexuals. This trend is occurring more around the world," Fallon said.

The committee has brought the Name Project AIDS Memorial Quilt to K-State twice and regularly brings speakers to campus. It has also produced a policy brochure for new campus faculty and supports the work SHAPE does in the residence halls and the Greek community.

Currie said the message she hopes awareness week sends will help students realize that a change in attitude is needed to fight AIDS.

"There are people out there whose attitude will never change," Currie said. "We need to treat those with this illness like anyone else."

For more information or a red ribbon symbolizing AIDS awareness, visit one of the informational tables from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. Tuesday through Thursday in the Union.

this," he said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

But the move to censure was complicated last week by GOP dissatisfaction with what it said were Clinton's evasive answers to 81 questions on the affair presented to him by Judiciary Committee Chairman Henry Hyde, R-Ill.

"This censure idea without an admission on the president's part is a political cop-out," committee member Rep. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., told NBC. "I do not want to have an unrepentant perjurer leading the nation into the 21st century."

"The Congress and the House have no other option but to vote impeachment or not," House Majority Whip Tom DeLay, R-Texas, said on CNN's "Late Edition."

Clinton has a chance to directly confront the committee on Dec. 8 when he or his representatives have been invited to testify.

White House spokesman Jim Kennedy said the White House is still evaluating how to respond to the invitation. Already, he said, "We've made a good-faith effort to respond to the questions despite the fact that they were designed more for a partisan purpose than a constitutional one."

One Senate Republican, Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, said Clinton should personally appear to defend himself. "I think he ought to have to answer questions and be subject to examination, because the answers that he gave were evasive," he said on "Fox News Sunday." "Let's bring the president in."

determination and goal setting to motivate young people. He said his position is service oriented and he will travel around 100,000 miles promoting FFA to students, businesses and industries.

"There are business in America and in Kansas that are not agriculture-related that can benefit from our members," Armbruster said. "Our members have good communication skills, a good work ethic and knowledge of the industry — anybody and any corporation can benefit from that."

Armbruster begins his service Friday and will travel to Indianapolis for training. In January, he will travel to Japan to discuss international agriculture and during the rest of the year attend conferences and conventions across the United States.

He said he is looking forward to the many different opportunities this next year, and it will provide him a great education.

"Going out and meeting people, seeing different cultures — that's an education, those are life's skills," Armbruster said.

Armbruster will take a leave of absence from K-State for the rest of this semester and next year. He said he has worked with his professors to finish classes early, and in other classes, he is taking incompletes and withdrawals.

"Most of my professors at K-State are really wanting to work with me," he said. "I think people at K-State and many other universities realize that there is more to an education than just the textbook. It is a good feeling even in a university of 20,000 that they care enough and they are happy for you."

KATS

day in the number of students using the system. Nov. 18 was a record-setting day — 51 percent of the students enrolling that day chose to use KATS rather than using the traditional method of enrolling in Willard Hall.

Streeter said KATS is safe, easy and convenient. He said they have no problems in ensuring that the system is safe for students to use.

"Using KATS is like using an ATM," Streeter said. "Students are given a pin number, and they should not give that number out to anyone. It is a very secure system."

Students who use KATS to enroll should find that the process is simple and less time-consuming than the traditional method, Registrar Donald Foster said.

"We have found that, on average, it takes a student three to five minutes to enroll on KATS," Foster said. "This means students only have to set aside a minimal slot of time to enroll."

Foster said students have been using the Internet as their preferred method instead of enrolling through KATS over the phone.

Students who use KATS to enroll are charged a $4 fee. Foster said the money goes toward paying for the system and its installment. The university borrowed money from the state of Kansas to purchase the system.

"We had to develop a revenue stream to pay for the system," Foster said.

"It was decided to charge a user fee of $4, which is not meant to be punitive, because we want to encourage the use of KATS."

When more students use the system, Foster said some of the salary money that now is used to pay the enrollment staff would be used to help pay for the system. He said the $4 fee won't last forever.

"We felt like the long-run convenience of the KATS system is more important than the nominal short-term fee," Foster said.

Added benefits to students might come next semester.

"We hope to add a KATS marketplace where students can obtain a parking permit and a Royal Purple (yearbook) while enrolling," Streeter said.

Foster said students also should remember that KATS can be useful in other ways.

"KATS can be used to maintain your address on your own and obtain your semester grades," Foster said. "There is a several-day delay in receiving your grades through the mail. With KATS, you can obtain your grades as soon as they are posted."

House seeks subpoenas in campaign investigations

By LAURIE KELLMAN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Republicans on the House impeachment panel moved Monday to subpoena FBI Director Louis Freeh and a federal prosecutor to gain access to their secret memos laying out alleged fund-raising irregularities in President Clinton's 1996 campaign.

"The committee has received information which suggests that the campaign finance abuse memos may contain allegations of criminal wrongdoing by the president," said Paul McNulty, a Republican spokesman for the House Judiciary Committee. "The committee is duty-bound to investigate that information."

The decision opens up a new avenue of investigation for the impeachment panel, at precisely the time that committee chairman Henry Hyde is pressing to wrap up work in time for a vote by Christmas on possible articles of impeachment against the president.

Hyde, R-Ill., and other Republicans will seek subpoenas today requiring Freeh and prosecutor Charles LaBella to answer questions in a deposition about their recommendation that an independent counsel be named to investigate Clinton fund-raising, committee officials said.

They also will seek separate subpoenas demanding that Attorney General Janet Reno turn over memos that Freeh and LaBella wrote laying out their arguments and demanding Clinton order

Judiciary Committee chairman presses to conclude inquiry as memos surface

Reno to comply, according to committee officials. No request is being contemplated to force Clinton to answer questions.

Republicans also said they want a subpoena that would direct Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr to hand over evidence and testimony that his investigators gathered from John Huang, a key figure in the fund-raising controversy.

Neither McNulty nor other committee officials would say what specific allegations against the president they believed the LaBella or Freeh memo contained.

The move by Republicans came amid a swirl of public posturing and behind-the-scenes maneuvering. Hyde blasted Clinton for submitting written answers to the committee that he said were not forthcoming while the White House indicated Clinton was unlikely to accept an invitation to testify before lawmakers.

"I don't think it's very likely you'll see the president appear before that committee," Clinton spokesman Joe Lockhart said.

Leaders in both parties tried to gauge support for articles of impeachment on the House floor.

House Democrats have conducted an initial survey and found that fewer than 10 members contacted since the Nov. 3 elections would vote for an article of impeachment against the president, said one congressional source familiar with the informal tally.

If that vote count holds, it means Republicans would have to approve any article of impeachment on a virtual party-line vote. Such a vote could be taken by the lame duck Congress that expires on Jan. 6. Alternatively, it would make impeachment virtually the first item of business for the 106th Congress. Republicans have a 228-206 majority in the expiring Congress, with one independent. Their majority is narrower in the new Congress — only six seats.

Reno has refused to let other congressional committees see the entire Freeh and LaBella memos, in part because they contained secret grand jury information, but Justice Department officials have been more open to assisting the Judiciary Committee.

In the past, courts have issued orders directing that grand jury information be sent to the House for use in an impeachment inquiry, including the one against President Nixon.

Republicans control the Judiciary Committee, 21-16.

Democrats blasted the move as proof of Republican desperation.

"We are just left shaking our heads at

Cinema to add 6 new theaters by next April

■ Stadium-style seating to be built at Carmike Seth Child Cinemas.

By SUZANNE WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If you think picking a movie to see at the theater is hard, wait until April.

Carmike Seth Child Cinemas is scheduled to open six new theaters with stadium-style seating in April 1999, making Seth Child Cinemas a 12-screen multiplex.

Stadium-style seating is designed to give movie watchers a better view of the screen. Each row is 14 to 16 inches higher than the row in front of it. Philip Smitley, assistant vice president and controller of Carmike Cinemas Inc., said this will keep people from straining to see around the person in front of them.

"If a guy with a cowboy hat walks in and sits in front of you, you'll still be able to see the screen," Smitley said.

Smitley said stadium-style seating is becoming the standard in movie theaters. The project at Seth Child Cinemas is part of an ongoing expansion by Carmike with 350 multiplex theaters throughout the United States. Smitley said he does not know how much of the construction has been completed at Seth Child Cinemas, but it should be finished in April.

Karen Gaffin, junior in political science and Spanish, said she is excited about the new seating option. She said the rows of seats in the theater now

World AIDS day today

Today is World AIDS Day, which promotes AIDS education and awareness.

In Kansas, there were 2,816 cases of AIDS reported from 1981 to June 30, 1998, according to the Office of Epidemiologic Services at the Kansas Department of Health and Environment.

Kansas is divided into nine regions for AIDS statistics. In Manhattan's region, 63 cases of AIDS were reported from 1981 to June 1998, according to the Kansas AIDS/STD Update from KDHE.

The Manhattan area ranks seventh out of the nine regions. The Kansas City region has the highest number, with 394 cases reported during the same time period.

AIDS statistics might not identify the whole story. Eunice Dorst, executive director of the Regional AIDS Project, said the number of people with AIDS is not where the problem is. Those who are infected with HIV, the virus that causes AIDS, aren't included in the AIDS statistics.

"People only look at the number of people with AIDS and forget that there are so many other people who are infected with HIV and don't know it and are passing on the virus," Dorst said. "Also, medications are moving well enough that HIV doesn't always reach where it is classified as AIDS."

World AIDS Day is recognized in conjunction with K-State's AIDS Awareness Week, which starts today and runs through Friday. The week is sponsored by Lafene Health Center, the Communicable Disease Committee, Regional AIDS Project and the STD, HIV, AIDS Peer Educators program.

Tom Davis, HIV/AIDS educator for California Health Services, is the keynote speaker. He will speak at 7 p.m. Wednesday in Union Forum Hall.

Proposal would protect center on Memorial Stadium grounds

By RUSSELL FORTMEYER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

■ OUR OPINION
The Collegian editorial board says these nets show just how poorly planned the building is. See Page 4.

Like something out of an episode of "Leave it to Beaver," no one wants to have to apologize for breaking a neighbor's window with a soccer ball.

The sports teams that eventually will use the renovated field in Memorial Stadium won't have to face this tough, character-building situation thanks to a proposal that, for members of the Campus Development Committee, seemed surreal at first.

The playing field's future neighbors, in the form of the unbuilt Alumni Center, are considering a proposal to shield themselves by constructing a large net that would be raised up on two flag poles at the southern end of the stadium.

The $7 million Alumni Center will be built at the corner of

Reno delays decision to investigate aide

■ Attorney General gets extension in case of White House employee.

By MICHAEL J. SNIFFEN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Attorney General Janet Reno postponed a decision Monday on whether an independent counsel should investigate a former top White House aide who is accused of lying about aid for a union that contributed to Democrats.

Reno obtained approval from a special court for up to 60 more days to review the case of former White House deputy chief of staff Harold Ickes.

The court found she had shown good cause for the requested extension, but Reno's reasons were not made public. She asked the court to seal the document explaining her need for more time, said people familiar with the case.

Reno met during the day with aides who were divided on how she should handle the allegation that Ickes committed perjury before a Senate committee about the administration's efforts on behalf of the Teamsters Union in a 1995 strike against Diamond Walnut Co.

Aides were advocating each of three options: ordering a counsel investigation, rejecting that idea or asking a special court for 60 more days to look into the question.

The FBI, for instance, was recommending, as it has for more than a year, that the case — indeed the entire campaign finance investigation — be handed to an outside prosecutor, officials said.

The Justice Department has spent 90 days in a preliminary inquiry on the Ickes matter and had to advise the special court, which selects counsels, by Monday whether Reno wanted to order the eighth independent counsel of her tenure to look into a top Clinton administration figure.

"There should be an explanation for a request for

Carjacker sentenced to 11 years for attack

TOPEKA — A man convicted of beating a woman and stealing her car while she was at a Topeka cemetery visiting her father's grave was sentenced Monday to 11 years and three months in federal prison.

James McGuire, 19, of Topeka, was convicted in September on one count of carjacking. U.S. District Judge Dale Saffels ordered him to serve his time without parole and to make restitution of $11,325.13.

U.S. Attorney Jackie Williams said McGuire attacked the woman with a baseball bat at Memorial Park in Topeka last April 13. He was arrested the next day in Manhattan in the woman's car.

A co-defendant, David G. Clovis, also 19 and from Topeka, pleaded guilty in August to being an accessory to the crime. He was sentenced to a year and a day in prison and also is ordered to pay restitution.

Prison escapee eludes guards for fourth day

HUNTSVILLE, Texas — Investigators found a hacksaw blade they believe was used by convicted killer Martin Gurule to begin his escape from death row, prison officials said Monday. Gurule remained free for a fourth day despite the efforts of 500 prison guards and 70 tracking dogs who searched heavily wooded and swampy areas around the state's death row.

"We're going to go on the assumption he's still here until we find evidence he's not," said Sgt. Tommy Freeman, who manages the dog teams at the prison.

Freeman and his dog teams have been searching since late Thursday when Gurule and six other condemned killers likely used the hacksaw blade to cut through a recreation yard fence at Ellis Unit about 85 miles northeast of Houston. They made it onto the roof, but six of the inmates were caught after guards starting firing.

Gurule, 29, went on to scale two fences topped with razor wire and dashed across a grassy area to disappear into heavy fog. He's the first inmate in 64 years to escape from the state's death row.

Clinton doubles aid for Middle East peace

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton sought to push the Mideast peace effort forward Monday, meeting with Yasser Arafat and pledging to nearly double U.S. aid to the Palestinians. "No peace stands a chance of lasting if it does not deliver real results to ordinary people," Clinton said.

While he spoke hopefully at an international donors conference of overcoming "bumps in the road" in the peace process he has fostered, political tensions between Arafat and Israel were rising again.

Arafat said he hoped to establish an independent Palestinian state. He also accused Israel of undermining the Palestinian economy with a "continued siege and frequent closure" of the borders with Gaza and the West Bank.

Despite U.S. appeals that Arafat tone down his statehood assertions as premature before negotiating a final settlement with Israel, the Palestinian leader welcomed pledges of assistance as helpful to "realize our independence."

At the midpoint in the one-day conference, nearly $2 billion had been pledged, including $480 million by the European Union, $200 million by Japan, $100 million by Saudi Arabia, $80 million by Kuwait, $50 million by the United Arab Emirates and $30 million by Canada.

Stocks remain shaky during heavy trading

NEW YORK — A week after a return to the record books, stocks plunged along a broad front Monday in the heaviest bout of profit taking since the market's record-setting rebound began in early October.

The Dow Jones industrial average tumbled 209.06, or by 2.2 percent, to close at 9,124.02, according to preliminary figures. Trading was active. It was the biggest drop since the Dow fell 210.09 on Oct. 1, which was the last time the blue-chip average fell by 100 points or more.

Just a week ago, the Dow closed at 9,374.27, reaching its first record high since July and capping a rebound of almost 2,000 points from a summer swoon.

Broader stock indicators also were posting big losses Monday amid worries about how much further the market can rally with the outlook for the global economy and company profits still uncertain.

Stocks also fell in large markets overseas. Key indicators closed down 1.2 percent in Tokyo; 1.9 percent in Frankfurt, Germany; 1.7 percent in London; and 2.7 percent in Paris.

Florida man confesses to killing his daughter

CLERMONT, Fla. — A father who reported his 6-year-old daughter missing on Thanksgiving Day confessed Monday to killing the girl and dumping her body in a remote area of central Florida, authorities said.

Richard Adams, 24, was charged with murdering his daughter, Kayla McKean. Kayla's stepmother, Marcie Adams, was not charged.

"Right now, only the father is charged," said Capt. Chris Daniels, a spokesman for the Lake County Sheriff's Office. "We're not going to discuss the details of whether she is involved or what her involvement might be."

He said Marcie Adams is cooperating with investigators, who offered no motive for the killing.

Earlier Monday, Kayla's mother said she was given a polygraph test.

"They're doing their best to find Kayla, and I'm confident they will find her," Elizabeth McKean said. "They have to narrow it down to everybody, so I'm not taking offense (at being questioned)."

Police said Kayla was at school on Tuesday but did not go to school on the next day.

Hundreds of volunteers began searching for Kayla on Thanksgiving Day when her father reported her missing to authorities. She had lived with her mother in the Orlando suburb of Casselberry for her entire life until last April when she moved in with her father and stepmother.

The search for Kayla continued through the weekend, and pictures of the girl were mailed out Monday to 2,000 Texaco gas stations around the country.

Box-office flops land Universal 2nd to last

UNIVERSAL CITY, Calif. (AP) — Professionally speaking, Casey Silver just met Joe Black.

The Universal Pictures chairman was forced to resign Monday after his movie division suffered a terrible year, culminating with the holiday weekend's disastrous opening of the expensive sequel "Babe: Pig in the City."

Other box office flops that have landed Universal second-to-last among major studios were "Primary Colors," "Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas," "Out of Sight" and the Nov. 13 release of "Meet Joe Black," starring Brad Pitt as the Grim Reaper. It cost more than $85 million to make and only has grossed $35.8 million after three weeks.

Silver was informed Sunday night by his boss, Universal Studios president and chief operating officer Ron Meyer, that the company wanted to make its second high-level management change this month. Two weeks ago, Universal Studios chairman and chief executive Frank Biondi Jr. got the boot.

"It's their prerogative, and I respect their decision," Silver said. "I want to help the company in whatever way I can for an orderly and smooth transition."

Silver had been head of Universal's movie production, marketing and distribution since November 1995.

Silver will continue to work with Universal as an independent producer. Terms of the new arrangement haven't been reached.

Silver's job security had been in question for months, as Universal released one dud after another. Even the well-reviewed film "Out of Sight" with George Clooney failed to generate box office heat, grossing just $37.5 million.

This has left Universal ahead of only financially struggling MGM in market share among the major studios.

Chiropractors handy in relieving stress, aches during finals

■ Carrying heavy bags, sitting too long can be detrimental to body.

By LAURAN COWDREY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If college students do not experience enough stress, there always is finals week. Many students will spend hours on end sitting at desks and studying.

In search of a peaceful environment, some students will roam from Justin Hall to the K-State Student Union and back again while carrying a load of heavy books.

This stress is detrimental to the body and can cause back pains, neck pains and headaches. These ailments can be helped by seeing a chiropractor, said Dr. Gregory Gehlhoof of Manhattan Chiropractic.

"During finals week, my student number increases a great deal," he said.

Gehlhoof said sitting and studying for a long period of time has an effect on students similar to that of sedentary work.

Both put a great deal of stress on the back and cause a pain between shoulder blades, he said.

Gehlhoof also said book bags are a cause of stress for college students, who do not have the luxury of leaving their books in a locker for the day.

To ease the pain, Gehlhoof said he recommends alternating the shoulder the book bag is carried on.

Valerie Peterson, junior in graphic design, said carrying a book bag causes her to hunch over, which aggravates a previous neck injury. Peterson sees a chiropractor once a month and said she has seen a vast improvement.

"It decreases headaches and tension," Peterson said. "It's made my injury much better."

Dr. John Wheeler of Manhattan's Chiropractic Health Center said the most common complaints he receives from college students concern neck and back pain and headaches.

Gehlhoof said chiropractic is a healthy and drug-free alternative to other pain relievers. With regular visits, the pain can be eased and even abolished.

"It's very simple," he said. "You restore the function."

Many people are skeptical about seeing a chiropractor and do not understand the benefits, Gehlhoof said.

Wheeler said it is a public misconception that causes this doubt and that chiropractic is a legitimate way to treat stress.

"The literature and research is there. It works and that is not a question," Wheeler said.

Gehlhoof said he recalled treating a college student who suffered from severe migraines several times a week. The student saw a physician who prescribed a drug treatment that had taste-altering side effects.

However, after seeing a chiropractor for three months, the frequency of the headaches was reduced to once a month, without medication.

Aside from the actual chiropractic

"IT DECREASES HEADACHES AND TENSION. IT'S MADE MY INJURY MUCH BETTER."

— VALERIE PETERSON
JUNIOR IN GRAPHIC DESIGN

techniques, Gehlhoof teaches patients exercises that will ease tension and keep them mobile.

Wheeler said he thinks it takes more than just chiropractic to treat injuries and stress. He said he encourages exercising, eating well and getting a good night's sleep.

Chiropractic also are useful for sports injuries, he said. Many people might have doubts, but he said he feels combining the medical field with kinesiology and chiropractic would be beneficial.

Gehlhoof said he recommends students see a chiropractor if they have a pain.

"Find a chiropractor that you are comfortable with," he said.

"Try it for a couple of weeks." Every chiropractor differs, he said. If students are not seeing results in two weeks, they should try a new doctor.

New organization promotes Japanese animation

By GABE ECKERT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Japanese animation is more than just cartoons — it's part of the Japanese culture.

A new campuswide organization, the Anime Society, is dedicated to a better understanding and the promoting of Japanese animation.

The organization was formed this semester by a group of students who want to provide better access to foreign animation for K-State students.

"Anime is Japanese animation," said Jennifer McCallum, junior in biology and Anime Society librarian. "It's not like American cartoons. It's aimed at teen-agers and adults."

Japanese anime differs from American cartoons in length, target audience and content, McCallum said. In Japan, anime is available on television, video and at movie theaters.

Japanese anime ranges in length from 30 minutes to more than two hours and often is based on an existing Japanese comic-book series. The content of the films ranges from romance and comedy to science fiction and horror.

"Japanese anime is so much more in-depth than American cartoons," McCallum said. "I think it's the variety of the anime that I like."

The variety of content is a benefit of anime, said Lynne Chen, sophomore in biology and Anime Society treasurer.

"There is enough variety in anime that everyone can find something they like," she said. "Anime is full of good stories, good characters and good graphics."

"IT'S DIFFICULT FOR AMERICANS TO UNDERSTAND THE IMPORTANCE OF JAPANESE ANIME BECAUSE WE VIEW ANIMATION SO MUCH DIFFERENTLY."

— JENNIFER MCCALLUM
ANIME SOCIETY LIBRARIAN

Members of the Anime Society enjoy using the films as an alternative form of entertainment, Chen said.

"Since it's animated, it can go beyond live television. It lets your imagination run wild," she said.

In addition to viewing anime, the Anime Society is building a collection of films to pass on to future members, McCallum said.

Nets symbolize all that's wrong with building

It's amazing what people will do to try and cover up the fact that a project near and dear to their heart is misguided.

From day one, the KSU Alumni Association's plans to build an alumni center south of Memorial Stadium have been muddled, ambiguous and, it needs to be said, sorry. The driving force behind this project has been pure hubris, not a selfless attempt to glorify K-State alumni and provide a social center for current students.

This hubris stems from an organization with motives that seem quite out of sync with the university's. K-State has wanted and needed a gateway for visitors arriving by automobile. The proposed alumni center site affords a rare chance for an institution to make a significant statement.

Instead, we are to believe giant nets behind a misplaced country club will be the inspiration that will drive K-State into the next century. Just who thinks large nets — even if they are used only temporarily during games in the stadium — will enhance the center? Maybe a fisherman, but we don't see many seas around K-State.

The whole concept seems so ludicrous on the surface, one wonders what the association will propose next. Even if the nets are a practical solution in football or baseball stadiums, the move to camouflage a building with them surely is unprecedented.

What project organizers don't want to admit is the proposed alumni center has no business overlooking an intramural playing field, especially when its face is covered in glass. They sure as sugar don't want to admit the proposed center really will play no significant role in day-to-day campus student life other than as a refuge for those students who work for the Alumni Association.

The nets represent a solution to a problem that doesn't exist, a problem that doesn't need to exist in the future, either.

It's not too late to consider transplanting plans for the center to a site that would be in closer to proximity to KSU Stadium, which is what the lion's share of alumni will use the center for access to. We urge the Alumni Association to reconsider.

We urge students to write or call association President Amy Button Renz, asking her to let the Memorial Stadium site remain dedicated to current students instead of housing a white elephant that is stuck in a place it doesn't belong.

AARON FRUEHLING

Columnist wishes to find meaning of holiday hoopla

VIEWPOINT

Chris Platt

I like to think Jesus had a good sense of humor. Like morticians and social workers, his line of work would have required him to step back and chuckle at his situation to keep from being overcome with anguish.

The Bible tells us Jesus experienced every human emotion, so I'm going to assume that he enjoyed a good yuck just as much as the next messiah.

Surely this month would be a laugh riot for him. His birthday is the basis for more hoopla than all the undergrads who ever turned 21 in Aggieville collectively. Church invades state as soon as the Thanksgiving plates are in the dishwasher, and there's no hiding place for people who don't want to join the party.

It's beginning to look a lot like Christmas. There is no way to comprehend what a cornerstone it is in our culture. We know the lyrics to countless Christmas carols, yet struggle with the words to the national anthem. Santa Claus and Jimmy Stewart are more recognizable, even more trusted, than our current president.

I was reminded of this as I was driving home from Thanksgiving. Our neighbors were putting out their timeless decorations: the ever-tasteful plastic baby Jesus in the manger, surrounded by the neon Mary and Joseph and Rubbermaid wisemen. A mere glimpse of the entourage practically transports one back to Bethlehem on that snowy evening.

Only, it probably wasn't snowing there. Also, if cultural anthropology is any indicator, Jesus probably wasn't Caucasian, as he is portrayed in my neighbors' yard art. And, by the time the wisemen reached their destination, Jesus had outgrown his swaddling clothes.

When the details of the greatest story ever told become this sketchy, one's faith begins to waiver.

Enter my atheist friends. When I came to college, I don't think I knew anyone who professed not to believe in a higher being. Fresh off the farm but wanting to play it cool, I allowed the over-bearing espousing of atheists and agnostics to roll off my back right along with the propaganda of right-winged crackpots.

As of late, however, both have exhausted my patience. Militant Christians have drained the season of its joy like a bad Gap commercial, and atheists have sponged off it like the welfare moms Newt Gingrich used to groan about. They, along with the capitalist merchants on Satan's payroll, parents who turn violent over toys in department stores and people who celebrate the holiday though they are too lethargic even to think about their own beliefs, have turned Christmas into an anomaly.

We have turned Christmas into the first snowfall of the year. The birth of Christ is synonymous with reindeer and cookies. The nativity equals presents and candy canes.

Meanwhile, there are many people in America who don't worship Jesus because they worship Buddha or Shiva. There are those who celebrate Hanukkah. There are even those who worship faithfully at the shrines of Elvis Presley and Marilyn Monroe. Likewise, there are those with no financial or physical means to celebrate anything.

Their faith is strong and rarely imposing. All the world's populace never will be forced to celebrate Yom Kippur. Yet Christmas always will be traipsed out for the neighbors to see.

We have turned Christmas into the first snowfall of the year. The birth of Christ is synonymous with reindeer and cookies. The nativity equals presents and candy canes.

I would love to have one Christmas with no lights, no trees, no pop music and no presents. My Christmas wish would be for everyone to have a bare bones December, just like any other month. Those who wish to celebrate the 25th could do so with no persecution from their government. Those who choose not to celebrate could go about their business with no interference.

Figure what the hell all the fuss is about for yourself, and then stick to your guns. I understand that beyond the big J.C.'s birthday, Christmas is an intangible, magical feeling. Mysticism, however, only can carry us so far. Let's not have any emotional free loaders get this personal exploration taken care of now, so as to beat the rush.

The Bible is a good book, but it's not the only book. Likewise, the Bible might not be the only book out there, but it's one hell of a read. Let's not have any emotional free loaders get this holiday season. Regardless of whether or not Jesus was the son of God, no one wants random, mooching guests at his birthday party.

The Bible tells me so.

Athletic department owes students, alumni apology

Editor,

I just wanted to say what happened on Nov. 14 was the most awesome experience of my life. However, thanks to Max Urlick and the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, I am left with a bad taste in my mouth.

Everyone and their dog knew when we beat Nebraska, the north goal post was going to come down. I think that to reinforce those goal posts intentionally by buying a "guaranteed-not-to come-down" version is just plain sick. Not only did it make the celebration a little tougher to start, it embarrassed the entire student body. I heard more than twice on the news that weekend how it took 33 minutes to tear down the goal post. I think the athletic department owes us (as loyal fans) an apology for this faulty image we have received in the eyes of the nation.

Or, you could continue to pretend that, once again, this is not a way to get back at us for not voting for the KSU Stadium expansion last year. I come from a family that always has supported K-State and its athletic department, and I feel that this intentional misrepresentation of K-State students is a royal slap in the face. Along with gaining success and experience with the football team, the athletic department needs to understand most of its growth is due to student and alumni support.

As a wise person once said, "Don't bite the hand that feeds you."

Society, Cosmo cause women to struggle with body images

VIEWPOINT

Mary VanLeeuwen

Women can't do anything right in the "Cosmopolitan" world. There's always an issue of dressing better, being more fashionable, applying your make-up in the right way, losing weight and gaining weight.

Yep, I said gaining weight. The double standard hits "Cosmopolitan" magazine and the world as popular society begins to curse women for having weight and not having enough weight.

The December issue of "Cosmopolitan" reads, "Diagnosis: psychosis! Someone send these stars sanity pills before their wacked-out ways spread to the rest of Trendytown."

"Psycho Slim: Did Calista Flockhart Ally McSeal her lips before the Emmys?"

I found this an interesting diagnosis coming from a magazine filled with advertisements featuring waif-like models on every other page, article after article on how to lose weight and every word screaming, "This is what you must be."

Newspapers are ranting about it, TV news is probing and the society that encourages anorexia and thinness is accusing Flockhart of selling out. They say she'd better gain some weight before every woman in the country flocks to Trendytown; however, they don't see the trend has been set for awhile now, and it has been set by the same people who are protesting it.

I realize there is a difference between being naturally thin and forcing thinness on oneself through dieting, starvation, 10 hours a day at the gym, various pills, cellulite burning creams and liposuction. I have several friends who eat normally and exercise never or moderately and who are just thin and healthy.

FOX has said Flockhart is healthy, yet Cosmo takes one look at her and my thin amigos and tells the world they are too thin, and then turn around, saying through models like Kate Moss and through articles on how to lose those pounds that thinness is what women should strive for.

Mixed messages? Who's the boss? Tony Danza? No, Cosmo is the boss, and it can contradict itself whenever it wants because it knows many women will always hate their fat and many women always secretly will despise thin women.

Women can't do anything right. Every time a female movie star gains 10 pounds, it's the talk of the town. Moss' incredible thinness caused an uproar for awhile, but now it's died down and we're accepting models — society's poster girls for beauty and physical perfection — weigh 23-percent less than the ordinary woman, according to Naomi Wolf, author of "The Beauty Myth" (check it out).

With standards for physical beauty like this, it's no wonder women admire their wrists more than any other body part, and, according to Wolf, 33,000 women told researchers they would rather lose 10 to 15 pounds over achieving any other goal.

Now, magazines are singling out a few thin women, who always have been thin, by the way, and accusing them of betraying women everywhere for looking like the average "Cosmopolitan" model. What is wrong with this picture?

When the television show "Ally McBeal" first came out, women and critics raved at its humor and at the light shed on feminist perspectives. Now, people are bashing this actress, saying feminists can't be thin because thin people are just playing up to society's standards for women.

Thank goodness society thinks it's OK for me to be a feminist because I have big hips and a derriere to match.

World, what's your problem? What do you want women to be? Do you want them to be beautiful? Do you want them to be trendy and fashionable? Do you want them to be thin? Do you want them to be fat? Do you want them to be themselves? What do you want?

Oh, Cosmo gods, we all will do anything to please you. Well, not quite all of us. Personally, I say society can just kiss my cellulite — and my skinny wrists.

Peers shocked by likely suicide of judge, wife

■ Evidence suggests no third-party involvement.

By TIM CURRAN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Colleagues of the former chief federal judge for Kansas struggled Monday to come to grips with his violent death during the weekend at his suburban home, where police found his body and that of his ailing wife.

U.S. District Judge Earl E. O'Connor, 76, and his wife, Jean Ann, 66, both died of apparent gunshot wounds. FBI spokesman Jeff Lanza said. Their bodies were discovered in the master bedroom of their home in Mission, Kan., and Lanza said it appeared each had been shot once in the torso.

Lanza said there was no evidence to indicate a third party was involved, but investigators were awaiting results of the autopsies to help them determine exactly what happened.

Lanza referred questions to Paul Morrison, the Johnson County district attorney. Morrison said he did not plan any public statement on the status of the investigation until today.

"One thing I think everyone is comfortable with is that there were no third parties," Morrison said. "So, it was either a murder-suicide or a double-suicide."

Colleagues described O'Connor as an upbeat person, not someone they would expect to do something violent.

"It's just so unbelievably out of character if he indeed did this," said James K. Logan, Olathe, who retired earlier this year after 21 years on the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

"I don't think I ever knew a man who was more poised and balanced than Judge O'Connor," said Paul Wilson, professor emeritus at the University of Kansas School of Law. "To think that he might become distraught is just unbelievable."

Ralph DeLoach, the U.S. District Court clerk for Kansas, said O'Connor had talked recently about his wife's illness, indicating it "might be a long road back."

"But he appeared to be optimistic that they would make it," DeLoach said.

Gov. William Avery named O'Connor to the Kansas Supreme Court in 1965, and in 1971 President Nixon nominated him to the federal bench. O'Connor became the chief federal judge for Kansas in 1981 and served until 1992, when he took senior status and reduced his workload.

He continued, however, to hear cases regularly.

O'Connor's first big federal case was the lawsuit the Justice Department filed to desegregate the schools in Kansas City, Kan. After a lengthy trial, in 1977 he ordered the district to adopt a plan that included some busing, closing one school and changing another to a magnet school.

After an appeals court ordered the case reconsidered, O'Connor told the district to develop a new plan, and he drew on that to develop one of his own that created clusters of elementary schools. In 1981, he ruled out district-wide busing.

Other rulings included one that all Kansas criminal laws could be enforced on American Indian reservations, and one rejecting a challenge to a city ordinance requiring employees of Kansas City, Kan., to live within the city.

DeLoach, the circuit clerk, said O'Connor was a fine administrator as well as a judge, and that he served as a mentor to many younger judges. One of them was U.S. District Judge Kathryn Vratil, who had been one of his clerks and replaced him when he took senior status.

"He had a gruff persona on the bench and put lawyers through their paces," she said. "He didn't cut slack for lawyers who came unprepared."

Logan, the former appellate judge, said O'Connor was a fantastic judge whose decisions rarely were reversed.

"Once, a public defender told me if he wasn't so strict on penalties, they'd never be able to appeal because he hardly ever made a mistake," Logan said.

Court ruling might affect aid, election districts

By LAURIE ASSEO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — With money and votes across the nation at stake, the Clinton administration asked the Supreme Court on Monday to reject a Republican challenge and let it adjust the 2000 census results to make up for an expected undercount of minorities.

No census finds everyone, but the government's plan "will best achieve the Constitution's goal of determining the number of persons in each state," Solicitor General Seth Waxman told the court. It is, in effect, a quality check on the initial head count to be conducted April 1, 2000, he said.

Lawyers for the Republican-led

House and a group of private citizens insisted the proposal violates the Constitution and federal law.

"A 100-percent head count is the only permissible means of apportioning the population," said Michael A. Carvin, representing private citizens from six states. So far, two lower courts have ruled the government's plan unlawful.

Adjusting the census likely would help Democrats because minorities and city residents made up a large share of the estimated 4 million people missed by the 1990 census.

The case could affect the shape of congressional, state and local election districts nationwide, as well as the way $180 billion in federal aid is handed out.

The court is expected to aim for a decision by March.

In the census case, the Constitution requires an "actual enumeration" to divide the 435 members of the House of Representatives among the states based on population. The justices appeared divided over what those words allow.

Justice Antonin Scalia seemed to agree, saying that if actual enumeration allows census numbers to be estimated, "what is excluded — rolling the dice?"

Justices John Paul Stevens and Stephen G. Breyer questioned House lawyer Maureen E. Mahoney's contention that census-takers cannot estimate how many people are in an apartment building, for example, if nobody responds.

The census is conducted mostly by mail, and about two-thirds of American citizens return their forms. Census workers then begin knocking on doors to find the rest of the forms.

The Clinton administration wants to find 90 percent of Americans through those methods and estimate the rest. Then, it would conduct a separate survey of 750,000 people across the country to decide where people have been under- or overcounted.

Cats return to court to face Loyola University of Chicago

By JOSH KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After the busiest opening month in K-State basketball history, Coach Tom Asbury's troops are preparing for their first test of the month tonight against the Loyola University of Chicago Ramblers (1-4).

Despite the 5-2 start last month, which included a 78-71 victory against Georgia State on Sunday, the Cats have had some up and down moments.

After missing the Cats' last contest after showing up late to a pregame meal, forward Manny Dies is expected to return to the lineup tonight against the Ramblers.

In the Maui Invitational, K-State went 1-2, with its only win coming in overtime against Arizona State, 84-80. The Cats' two losses were to top-25 ranked teams, No. 16 Indiana and No. 24 Clemson.

Against Indiana, K-State dominated the first half en route to a 16-point lead at halftime, only to lose the game 71-70 in the final minutes after the Cat's shooting went cold, missing 11-straight shots in the final 10 minutes.

Though the Wildcats lost a close one to the Hoosiers, lesser-ranked Clemson dominated K-State totally in a 79-45 loss. Unlike the opener against Indiana, which featured an up-tempo K-State attack, the Cats looked like a different team against the Tigers, encountering poor first-half shooting that resulted in a 40-19 halftime deficit.

After an intense opening month, K-State is hoping the experience and exposure will translate into a solid team effort.

Loyola head coach Larry Farmer is in his first year at the helm of the Ramblers. He spent last year as an assistant to Jim Harrick at Rhode Island, who went to the Elite Eight in the NCAA Tournament. Farmer played three years at UCLA, where he was a member of three National Champion teams that went 89-1 under Bruins coaching legend John Wooden.

He eventually became an assistant coach at his alma mater under three different coaches before taking over the UCLA job in 1981. Farmer maintained the job for four seasons, compiling a 62-23 record in his tenure.

The Wildcats' main priority will be to contain the Ramblers 6-8 senior forward, Javen Goodman, who led the team in scoring in 1997-98 with an average of 16.8 points per game.

Goodman continues to lead the team in scoring this season with 13 points per game.

The Ramblers have struggled this season, with their only win coming against Chicago State, 65-52.

The contest gets underway at 7 tonight at Bramlage Coliseum.

ROLLER-COASTER RIDE

FOR THE K-STATE VOLLEYBALL TEAM, THIS PAST WEEKEND WAS THE BEST OF TIMES AND THE WORST OF TIMES. A PAIR OF LOSSES TO CONFERENCE RIVALS COLORADO AND NEBRASKA WAS QUICKLY OVERSHADOWED BY SUNDAY'S INVITATION TO THE NCAA TOURNAMENT.

Volleyball team finishes season at 18-11, 12-8 in conference; NCAA Tournament, Georgetown are focus for team now

STORY BY JOSH KINDER

Before the No. 20 K-State volleyball team's (18-11, 12-8 Big 12) NCAA Tournament Central Regional bid was announced Sunday, the Cats had to close out their regular season at home in Ahearn Field House. They lost in four games to No. 17 Colorado and in three games to No. 3 Nebraska, whom the Cats haven't beaten in the previous 58 attempts.

The Huskers took care of K-State 15-3, 15-12 and 15-7.

"We've lost other matches before," head coach Jim McLaughlin said.

"There are losses and wins that you have to learn to leave behind. We need to focus on the next opponent and what we have to do. But most of the time, you focus on what you have to do.

"You can't worry about the team too much. Ultimately, it's how you serve and pass that's going to determine how well you do."

McLaughlin said Nebraska lived up to its No. 3 ranking by getting on the Cats from the start.

"The Huskers got on our tendencies really quick," he said. "Game 1 was over before we knew it. We got into a good rhythm in the second game, but they made some great play at the end.

"They've got every opportunity to win the national title this year. They're really a great team. They just got a regional, and they're ready to go," McLaughlin added.

The match against Colorado lasted 2 hours, 40 minutes. The Cats were attempting to sweep the Buffs in a season series for the first time since 1984 but were knocked off 15-13, 9-15, 16-14 and 15-8 in the lengthy match.

"Against Colorado, we didn't convert on our opportunities," McLaughlin said. "That was the difference, because we were creating and working hard, so that was the only area. Other than that, we blocked well and played good defense."

The Cats' state of mind is that a new season begins Friday night in Utah at the Central Regional where the Cats open up tournament play against Big East Conference co-champion Georgetown. McLaughlin said he doesn't think the team will dwell on the two losses that ended the regular season.

"I think we feel good," McLaughlin said. "We had a good practice yesterday. When the Colorado and Nebraska matches were over, a whole new season started. The preseason got us ready for the conference, and our conference season got us ready for the NCAA's.

"We are better this year than last year. Now we're 0-0. Nebraska is 0-0. It's a fresh start for us. We're more prepared going into the tournament this year than we were last year."

One bright spot for the Cats this weekend came against Colorado when Disney Bronnenberg set a K-State single-season record for assists with 1,568 on the 1998 season.

Bronnenberg is the current leader in the NCAA for assists.

Texas A&M players bank on experience

■ Win would give K-State 1st conference title, keep alive national title hopes.

By JAIME ARON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Texas A&M coaches and players know exactly what to expect in St. Louis for the Big 12 Conference championship: more hoopla than a regular-season game but not as much as a bowl game.

Aggies coach R.C. Slocum hopes that experience will be an advantage Saturday against K-State.

"I think it would have to help some," Slocum said in a conference call Monday. "I think every time you compete, every time you're in a big ball game ... players grow from it. I would think going in and knowing what to expect would be a positive."

Experience in league championships may be the only category the No. 20 Aggies (10-2) have over the No. 2 Wildcats (11-0), even if that experience wasn't a good one.

A&M was beaten 54-15 by Nebraska in last year's title game.

The stakes in this game are much higher for K-State, which needs a victory to keep alive its outside chances to play for the national championship Jan. 4.

The Wildcats are third in the Bowl Championship Series standings behind Tennessee and UCLA. To have any chance of moving into the top two, K-State must win and either hope the Volunteers or Bruins lose or the Wildcats look so good in their victory that they move up in the AP standings.

"It's real frustrating," said return specialist David Allen. "But we know if we win out something good might happen for us. So we've just got to keep on winning."

K-State coach Bill Snyder said he doesn't understand the BCS standings and he won't bother to figure them out. His focus is solely on beating A&M.

"We realize that that's the only thing we have any kind of control over — and A&M certainly has an impact on that, too," Snyder said. "We don't understand the system and the nuances, but we do understand that we're not going to have any impact on how that plays out. Our main concern is to do all we can to play well."

Snyder said he's not asking his players to try embarrassing A&M just for the sake of winning poll votes.

"I think when you start thinking along those lines you're going to create problems for yourselves," he said. "I believe our players believe the same way. Texas A&M is too good of a team to think about winning by a particular margin."

"Our major concern is doing the things we do as well as we can to give us a chance to win. Anything beyond that probably puts us in harm's way."

The Aggies had been riding a 10-game winning streak until losing Friday to Texas, 26-24.

"We lost a two-point road game to a team that probably has the Heisman Trophy winner and a very good offensive line," Slocum said. "We're going forward and picking up the pieces and looking forward to the challenge ahead of us."

Online meetings can offer friendships, romance

By M.A. LOROFF
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

People are finding more ways to reach out and touch someone in the age of technology. In the 1800s, people found mail-order brides. In the 1990s, they are finding cyber companions.

Beth Braaten, junior in international business, found her friend, Dave Mangan, through Internet classifieds.

"I was really bored one day, so I looked up classifieds on the Web. I wrote a bunch of e-mails and waited for replies," Braaten said.

After receiving replies, Braaten wrote the people who seemed the most interesting. A few days after they began writing each other, Braaten and Mangan decided to meet.

"I wasn't nervous because I like to meet new people. If we didn't hit it off, we never had to talk again," Braaten said.

Jesus Hernandez, freshman in horticulture therapy, said talking to people without knowing if they are telling the truth can be difficult.

"You never know who you are talking to," he said. "You don't know if the person is a girl or really a guy. For all you know, it could be your mom talking to you from the upstairs computer."

Hernandez said honesty is a big issue.

"When I talk to people, I'm honest if they are honest with me," he said. "If she tries to tell me she's a 6'3" beautiful blonde, I say, 'so am I.'"

The meeting between Braaten and Mangan turned out well because they were honest with each other, but Braaten said she also has horror stories. She met a man in a chat room who really was depressed.

"I started talking to him because I'm nice, and I wanted him to feel better," she said.

After several long nights of chatting and $400 worth of phone bills, the cyberguy decided he wanted to meet her.

"He was the kind of guy parents warn their children about," Braaten said. "He looked like Elvis stuck in the '80s, and he stunk. Literally."

Braaten said she still talks to people in the chat rooms.

"I have to give people the benefit of the doubt," she said. "Just because one person lies doesn't mean everyone does."

John Bowman, a Manhattan resident, met his cyber-sweetheart in a chat room.

Bowman said he and a woman named Deana started talking in April 1997 and started calling each other later that month.

"She's from San Dimas, Calif. I had already planned a trip to California to see my brother, so we decided to meet at Disneyland," he said.

Bowman said he thought the Internet is a good place to learn about people because there are no distractions.

"You learn more from words because you aren't distracted by looks," he said. "You can get to know a person for who they really are."

At the same time, Bowman said he warns that people can't base relationships on words.

"You really have to meet someone. You can get to know people well, but parts are missing," he said. "The computer can't give you the entire package, just pieces."

Distance also is an issue worth consideration.

Bowman said he and Deana have decided to put their relationship on hold for a while and just be good friends because they live so far away.

"We still call each other often and are really close," he said. "It's just hard to be that far apart."

Although the Internet is a good place to meet people, Bowman and Braaten both said to use caution.

"Don't give out personal information over the Internet," Bowman said. "If you trust a person enough to give them personal information, get their e-mail address from them."

Braaten said she agreed. "Always be cautious. You never know what kind of strange people might be lurking," Braaten said.

Bowman said he warns people to be wary of those who come into the chat rooms looking for cybersex and fights.

Jazz ensemble to play at McCain Wednesday

■ Performance showcases smooth 'big band' tunes.

By ERIN MCGLINN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

The K-State Jazz Ensemble will provide smooth tunes for music lovers at 8 p.m. Wednesday in McCain Auditorium.

MORE INFO?

The K-State Jazz Ensemble will perform at 8 p.m. in McCain Auditorium. Admission is free.

The ensemble is directed by Wayne Goins, assistant professor of music education and assistant band director.

Jazz usually is credited with the sounds and rhythms that produced rock 'n' roll.

"In my opinion, jazz can be described as a traditional 'big band' type of music, with full sounds coming from a variety of instruments," Goins said.

Jazz lovers will hear a variety of tunes from some popular composers.

"The group will be performing songs arranged by such famous jazz composers as Frank Mantooth, Dave Barduhn and Sammy Mespico," Goins said.

The jazz ensemble is divided into three different groups. Each will play separate performances Wednesday evening in a climactic fashion.

The first section of the ensemble is known as 'Lab A,' and the second section of the ensemble is known as 'Lab B.'

The final section of the ensemble, known as the 'CJE' section, will perform last. It is the top band of the jazz ensemble.

Each section of the jazz ensemble consists of 18 members. The ensemble features five saxophones, five trumpets, four trombones, and four rhythm sections of bass guitar, drums and piano.

Admission is free to the student jazz performance.

House of Pain's Everlast explores new style, subjects on latest CD

By JEFF SAAE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

House of Pain burst onto the scene in 1992 with its self-titled debut album and the still-popular single "Jump Around."

Review
Music
out of 5

After the release of two less successful albums and singles, the group disbanded and went separate ways. DJ Lethal joined Limp Bizkit and is seeing more fame than he ever did with House of Pain. Danny Boy O'Connor changed careers and now is in advertising. The head man, Everlast, stuck with his music and pursued a solo act.

After two years of silence, he has resurfaced with his new album, "Whitey Ford Sings the Blues."

This disc has a sound easily distinguished from the three House of Pain albums. Everlast combines acoustic guitar with a turntable mix to create sounds similar to Sublime's "Forty Ounces to Freedom."

He has not given up his hip-hop background for alternative or pop music, but you won't find his album in the rap section of a music store, either.

MTV, however, apparently thinks Everlast has something new to offer with his fresh sound since it has made his first video from "Whitey Ford" a "Buzzclip."

This new album is as different from Everlast's older stuff as he is from his old way of life and thinking.

He has given up his gangster lifestyle and stopped glorifying drinking malt liquor and smoking marijuana. He now sings about injustices in society and in the music industry itself.

Still, the music never seems sappy or as if it belongs in a charity commercial. It remains in a hip-hop format with deep bass and a good backbeat that keeps you listening. Don't judge the album yet — the entire album is not a message about what is wrong in the world. He does remain true to some of the East Coast rap ethics — having a good time and insulting sell-outs.

Being an avid fan of House of Pain for as long as they have been around, I hope this new album and new style will revive Everlast's career and boost him into the spotlight with the other mainstream artists.

With any luck, he'll be climbing the charts like his former band members, DJ Lethal and Limp Bizkit.

are spaced too close together. "I'm a short person, and the seats hit my knees," Gaffin said.

Smitley said the amount of room allowed in front of each new seat should be enough for an average-sized man to sit comfortably.

"I'm 6 feet tall, and I have plenty of room," Smitley said.

Amy Price, sophomore in hotel and restaurant management, said she likes having more space between the seats, but the difference in height is too much.

"Their head is right where my feet are, so if I wanted to move my feet around, I'd have to be really careful,"

Price said.

Smitley said the seats also will contain retractable armrests that can be moved up into the seat or down for beverage use.

"We call them love seats," Smitley said.

Smitley said the seats got their nickname because couples can move the armrest out of the way if they want to sit closer.

"I like them so I can sit Indian-style, if there is no one sitting next to me and because you can snuggle," Gaffin said. "It is so uncomfortable to hold hands with that thing in the way."

Smitley said the stadium-style seats that will be in the new Seth Child theaters probably will appear to have more cushion as well. Gaffin said that's her favorite part of the new seats.

"You sit in the chair and you're like, 'Eww, Lazyboy!'" Gaffin said.

The back of the chairs will be slightly higher, too.

Smitley said people should be able to rest the back of their neck on the new chairs. Gaffin also was excited about this feature.

"In the seats now, I have to slump in this will bring more people in, and the building probably will be more crowded with six more screens to choose from."

"We don't have anything like that here," Price said. "I've only been in them once, and that was in Lawrence. It's overwhelming with all the people — different times, different showings — you could see any movie you wanted to."

"The stadium-style seats are more comfortable," Christiansen said. "I think it's nice to have something to rest your head up against, but then you don't know who sat there before you."

Gaffin said having more theaters with this type of seating will create a more positive environment for moviegoers in Manhattan.

Smitley said the new theaters will show new releases. Christiansen said this will bring more people in, and the building probably will be more crowded with six more screens to choose from.

"We don't have anything like that here," Price said.

"I've only been in them once, and that was in Lawrence. It's overwhelming with all the people — different times, different showings — you could see any movie you wanted to."

Denison and Anderson avenues but will have large expanses of glass looking out on the field of the stadium. The net concept first was presented to the public at a development committee meeting earlier this fall.

"We want to be able to make sure the building, even though it is at some distance away from the actual playing field, wouldn't be hit," said Jerry Carter, university architect and director of facilities planning, "or that people that might be in that area would not be hit during a game."

Carter likens the net to the large nets used in baseball stadiums or hoisted behind goal posts during field goal kicks in football games. The current design concept would call for two flag poles that would be used to hoist the net temporarily during games.

"By and large, this is an issue we're letting the Alumni Association and their architects spend more time on," he said.

Mae McKee is a project architect on the Alumni Center for Gossen Livingston Architects of Wichita. He said the net concept is still in the discussion stages, since the building itself still is undergoing design changes.

"There has been a discussion, but no work has occurred yet on these concepts," McKee said.

"There has to be some kind of protection of the center from the sports field."

CLINTON

the weirdness of it all. We've said it before, and this is confirmation that this is an impeachment in search of a crime," Democratic committee spokesman Jim Jordan said.

"This says quite a bit, I suspect, about the confidence Republicans have in the strength of the case they've assembled at this point."

Hyde criticized Clinton's answers last week to 81 questions posed by impeachment investigators and said his panel might be forced to accept prosecutors' allegations against Clinton as fact.

"He has made it very clear he is going to stick with his reliance on bizarre technical definitions and legalistic defenses," Hyde said in a statement. He added, "Instead of shedding new light on the key facts, the president chose to evade them."

The White House dismissed Hyde's criticism. "The president made a good-faith effort to respond to politically motivated questions. The chairman should recognize that the country's interests in a fair and constitutional process comes ahead of partisan games like this," spokesman James Kennedy said.

Hyde's committee ran into another obstacle Monday.

During a private session with investigators, Maryland Democratic operative Nathan Landow invoked his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination and declined to answer questions, said a committee official who spoke on condition of anonymity. Landow refused to comment as he left the hour-long meeting.

Committee members and aides tried to question Landow, a real estate developer, about whether he was aware of any effort to influence the testimony of former White House volunteer Kathleen Willey, who has accused Clinton of making a sexual advance in 1993. Willey has testified she discussed her testimony with Landow.

The committee prepared for a hearing today, its third since the inquiry began, to explore what Republicans said were "the consequences of perjury and related crimes."

RENO

60 additional days," said Senate Judiciary Committee member Arlen Specter, R-Pa., who said Reno "delays and delays and delays ... Long ago, Attorney General Reno should have appointed independent counsel in a broad way on campaign finance issues."

Republicans repeatedly have pressed her to relinquish control of the campaign finance investigation, but for two years she has refused to take it from her campaign finance task force. That group of 120 prosecutors and agents has charged 14 people, including some prominent Democratic contributors.

Ickes has denied any wrongdoing in the matter, which stems from one question he was asked during the third day of a private deposition he gave the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee on Sept. 22, 1997.

In 1995, Ickes met with Teamsters leaders about the Diamond Walnut strike. An administration memo prepared for him noted that the union had given $2.4 million for Democratic candidates in 1992 and suggested that the party should consider helping the Teamsters on key issues, like the strike, if it wanted to continue to receive that support.

Ickes was closely involved in managing President Clinton's 1996 re-election fund raising.

The Senate panel, which was investigating campaign finance practices, asked, "What did the administration do regarding the Diamond Walnut strike?"

Ickes said, "Nothing that I know of." There were no follow-up questions on the subject.

According to a Teamsters memo obtained by the committee, Ickes said he asked then-U.S. Trade Representative Mickey Kantor if he would urge Diamond Walnut to settle its dispute with the union.

Ickes has acknowledged asking Kantor to make a phone call. Kantor subsequently called the company's chief. He has said the call was not motivated by fund raising and that the administration never acted to punish the company on behalf of the Teamsters. Kantor said he merely asked the status of a possible settlement and applied no pressure.

THE ARMY CAN HELP YOU GET A $40,000 EDGE ON COLLEGE.

The Army can help you get an edge on life and earn up to $40,000 for college through the Montgomery GI Bill plus the Army College Fund.

Here's how it works. Enlist for four years. You then contribute $100 a month for the first year from your $11,100 first year salary. The Army then contributes the remainder. Enlist for three years and you earn $33,000 or enlist for two years and earn $26,500. Army opportunities get better every day. If you qualify, you could train in one of over 200 challenging and rewarding high-tech skills in fields like avionics and electronics, satellites and microwave communications, computer and radar operations—just to name a few.

It makes sense to earn while you learn. For more information about getting money for college, call your Army Recruiter today.

A CHRISTMAS CAROL A DICKENS CLASSIC
ORDER YOUR TICKETS TODAY!

Sunday, December 6, 3 p.m.
Public: $24, 20, 16
Seniors: $22, 18, 14
Students/Children: $12, 10, 8
CALL MCCAIN AT 785-532-6428
You can charge your tickets to VISA, MasterCard, or Discover. Or stop by the box office, noon to 6 p.m., weekdays.

Take a break from the hustle and bustle of the holiday season and spend an afternoon in 1880s London, as the Nebraska Theatre Caravan brings Charles Dickens' classic, A Christmas Carol, to life.

The Caravan's version, now in its 20th year, promises a delightful afternoon where audiences of all ages will enjoy a holiday story in a production that features elegant costumes and lavish sets. As one critic wrote, "...the performance, along with rich and colorful scenery and period costuming, all combined to create a Christmas flavor one could almost taste just by watching...and what a superior taste it was."

Don't miss the holiday treat that will captivate your whole family!

Once In A Lifetime
Sharing your engagement and wedding announcements in the Collegian the first Friday of every month

Your engagement and wedding are special moments in your life and the Kansas State Collegian wants to help you share the news with family and friends. This semester you can put your announcement with a picture in the Collegian's "Once in a Lifetime" special section for FREE.

"Once in a Lifetime" runs the first Friday of every month: Oct. 3, Nov. 6 and Dec. 4. It will resume in the spring semester with the following publication dates: Feb. 5, March 5, April 2 and May 7.

To publish your announcement, please complete the attached form and mail it or take it to Student Publications, Kedzie 103 (east of the K-State Student Union). The deadline for getting your announcement in the paper will be the Wednesday preceding the publication date.

Rec Report

Recreational Services' Offices Located in Peters Recreation Complex

Intramurals

Whether it's the thrill of competition or the fun of playing sports, Recreational Services offers a variety of intramural sporting events. "We offer many intramural events ranging from individual sports to team events. Each year thousands of Rec users participate in intramurals," said Steve Martini, Rec Services' intramural director.

Intramurals are offered for both men and women in several divisions. For the men, they usually compete in three divisions: fraternity, residence hall or independent. The women all compete in one division.

"Playing athletics in high school, I thought intramurals would not be as competitive, but I have found there is a lot of competition between teams. It's a different atmosphere than high school sports, but the competitiveness is still there," said Kellie McClellan, a junior in public relations who often participates in intramurals. "One of the things I thought I would miss about sports in high school is the team spirit. It's great how your team can play together each year and create that same spirit here at K-State."

Several sports offer a co-rec division for men and women eligible to participate. Also, faculty and staff may play either in the student division or in the faculty/staff division set up for certain activities.

For each intramural event, individuals and teams must pay an entry fee and fill out registration information. For more information on each event, participants pick up information sheets outlining the event and its details. Generally, intramural events run several weeks. Individual events are played in a single-elimination bracket format. Team sports run through league play with each team playing each other at least one time. These brackets and league listings are posted in the intramural gallery located on the first floor of the Rec Complex. Playoff brackets are then developed from the final league standings, and single elimination tournaments are held to determine the divisional champions. For those teams or individuals winning their divisions, they are awarded with an intramural champion T-shirt.

The fall 1998 intramural season is nearing its end, but spring 1999 offers more opportunities to participate in intramurals. Entries for basketball and the individual sports of handball doubles, racquetball doubles, table tennis doubles and wallyball doubles are due by Jan. 21. "Our fall intramural season had high participation rates, and the spring promises to be the same," Martini said. After finishing up the winter-season intramural events, we will move outdoors again to finish up the events in the spring of the semester."

Amy Nery, native to Grapevine, TX, is a senior in nutritional science and pre-dentistry. She has worked for during the past year as an exercise leader. This semester she leads the step challenge and step and tone aerobics classes. Nery became interested in working at the Rec as an exercise leader after attending aerobics sessions herself as a student. "I have attended aerobics classes since I was a freshman. I became interested in leading the classes so I decided to work for the Rec." She said this has helped her to motivate others. "I like to challenge the people that come to my class. I want them to walk away from my class feeling like they got a good workout and wanting to come back to my class again."

Nathan Meyer, originally from Ellinwood, KS, is a senior in history graduating this December. He has worked for Recreational Services for 3 1/2 years as an intramural official for three semesters and as an intramural supervisor for four semesters. Meyer wanted to work for Rec Services because of his interest in sports.

"Coming up to K-State, some friends and I heard about working for the Rec. I've always been involved with sports, and a job with the Rec sounded like a better job than just sitting behind a desk," he said. During his time working with Rec Services, Meyer said he has most enjoyed the people he works with. As his graduation approaches, Meyer is considering his career options and is looking into flying schools to be a pilot.

Free Blood Pressure Checks

Blood pressure checks can be requested in the Wellness Resource Center any time a Rec Services' fitness consultant is available.

Office Closed

The office will close at 5 p.m., Thursday, Dec 24, for the holidays. We will re-open on Monday, January 4, at 8 a.m.

10% Discount

January and spring semester facility use cards go on sale Monday, Dec 21, in the administrative office. A 10% discount off the monthly rate will be given when purchasing a semester card for the months of January-May.

Outdoor Rental

The Outdoor Rental Center is closed during the winter months. However, special arrangements can be made by calling the Recreational Services office at 532-6980. Twenty-four hour advance notice is required for any rental over the winter.

Locker Renewal

Fall semester lockers expire December 31! Please renew in the administrative office by Thursday, December 24. Spring locker rentals will begin Monday, January 5.

Fitness Facts

It is a common fact that Americans are obsessed with flat stomachs often known as "washboard abs". Thus, the question has arisen as to the benefits of the abdominal exercise machine over the standard crunch. Well, results have shown that you need not spend those extra $$$$. No added benefits have been shown by using the machines. The only benefit to the machine may be the added incentive it may supply. So, if sinking money into the equipment means that you will do the exercise more, then by all means purchase away! However, don't lose sight of the fact that doing crunches alone will not give you perfect abs. You still need to make sure you consume a healthy diet and get regular cardiovascular exercise. It is the cardiovascular exercise that actually burns the fat - the crunches just aid in the toning of the area.

Rec Check
Rec Check provides program and facility information 24 hours a day by dialing 532-6000. Call Rec Check for Recreation Complex and Pool hours, exercise sessions, intramural deadlines and more!

Entry Policies:

- Facility users must be affiliated with KSU - student, faculty/staff or alumni association member.
- Cards are not sold to the general public.
- Call the Recreational Services office at 532-6980 for details.

For Your Convenience

Facility hours and exercise schedules are now available on the Recreational Services home page at <http://www.recservices.ksu.edu>

Pool Action

Looking for something to do over semester break? Come down to Ahearn and enjoy one of the three swimming pools we have available at the Natatorium. There is a 6-lane pool where you can play a game of water basketball or just lounge around in the water. The 8-lane pool is available for lap swimming and the diving well is used for aqua jogging or diving. There are two 1-meter and two 3-meter spring boards available in the diving well. The last day aqua aerobics will be offered for the fall semester will be Friday, December 11. Sessions will resume during the first week of spring semester classes.

Mania

Nutrition Notes

It is time once again for cold season to come knocking on our door. Once the sniffing, sneezing, and running nose takes over, everyone searches in desperation for a "cure-all". The American Dietetics Association has a suggestion. While it may not be the cure-all, vitamin C has been found to help fight colds. Research shows that people who consume vitamin C once a cold starts get rid of the cold sooner. Regardless of whether you have a cold at the moment, vitamin C has been shown to warrant other health benefits such as reducing the risk of heart disease or certain cancers. If one consumes the recommended amount of fruits and vegetables on a daily basis, you are more than likely getting enough vitamin C. However, if you are unsure, here are some good sources of foods rich in vitamin C: oranges, grapefruits, and their juices. Let's also not forget broccoli, brussels sprouts, cabbage, tomatoes, green peppers, strawberries, potatoes and cantaloupe. So, the next time you get that stuffy nose feeling, think about including some vitamin C along with that chicken soup.

My Favorite Workout

For Will Long, senior in biological and agricultural engineering, intramurals are a part of his weekly workout. He said he usually enters both individual and team sports and plays several intramural games each week. "By playing intramurals, that's when workouts become fun because you're exercising and getting a good workout while you're having fun," Long said. When he's not playing intramurals, Long enjoys playing racquetball and pick-up games of basketball. "Playing racquetball improves quickness, agility and strength, and playing basketball better endurance," Long said. "I enjoy the competition with friends because you don't let yourself down and don't let your friends down. They keep you playing hard." Long offers some advice for those wanting to include intramurals as part of their workout routine: "Have fun when you workout, or it will be hard to continue. Make sure fun is the most important part of your workout."

Building code violations spur rental inspection debate

By TIM RICHARDSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Leo Prieto said he never thought having one electrical outlet in the kitchen was a problem. He never noticed the faulty wiring in his house. He never thought the partly cracked wall posed any immediate danger.

He didn't know these were all building code violations.

Prieto, senior in Spanish, social science and pre-law, lives in an older house in Manhattan — like many other students. Code violations are more frequent in such living conditions, as Prieto discovered. By having regular inspections, he said students' living standards would increase.

"It was a reality check when I found out about all of the violations," he said.

Inspections not mandatory

Rental properties are inspected upon change of ownership or following tenant complaints or requests. The burden to make the necessary repairs to be in compliance with codes falls on the landlord.

Prieto said inspections should be made on a regular basis to ensure everyone is living in a safe environment.

"It would crack down on landlords who don't work on their buildings," he said. "Something will happen unless we do something about it."

Steve Burnett, assistant director of technical services at the Manhattan Department of Fire Services, said there has been discussion in the past concerning mandatory inspections.

A change in the system would require approval by the Manhattan City Commission. Burnett would not comment on whether he would prefer a mandatory inspection process.

"It would be pretty time-consuming," he said.

Before inspections are conducted, fire services gets permission from the owner or tenant of the property. The landlord is then notified of violations and is given time to fix them. Follow-up inspections are done to assure the violations are remedied properly.

Burnett said that if a tenant calls with a specific complaint about the property, the inspector will look at the entire property.

"If they think they have some violations, then they can contact us, and we will see what's there," he said.

Phil Anderson, faculty representative to Student Senate and instructor of speech communication, theater and dance, has owned rental property for 15 years. He said it is impossible to think the city could inspect all rental properties in Manhattan.

OUR OPINION

The Collegian editorial board says delinquent landlords need to be held accountable. See Page 4.

Manhattan is a tragedy waiting to happen, and the city will not change its inspection policy until a student death occurs, he said.

"I've always maintained that the city won't do anything until a couple of students are killed in a tragedy," Anderson said.

Many of the properties Anderson has purchased have had several code violations, he said. In one property, copper pipe was used, which is against the code of the Building Officials and Code Administrators International Inc., a non-profit organization set up to provide a code for public health and welfare.

Another property he purchased had five open-flame gas space heaters in a three-story house and duct work that was done incorrectly. Anderson had to redo the duct work to comply with city codes. He also has had to redo the wiring or plumbing on some properties.

"Every time I buy rental property and renovate it and realize people have been living there, it occurs to me that it was very unsafe," Anderson said.

One reason the properties are not

Inspection info

A property can be inspected before the prospective tenant moves in, if there is permission from the owner.

Inspections are free in Manhattan but only can be done in city limits.

Inspections take about 30 minutes for apartments, 1 hour for a single-family house and up to 2 hours for big buildings.

Common violations are egress windows in basement apartments, ceiling heights, smoke detectors, electrical fuses that are too big and electrical splicing for more apartments than a house originally was intended for.

Inspectors usually can come out the same day or next day after receiving call to do the inspection.

If situation is an emergency, they usually can inspect the property immediately.

Clinton, Dole asked to repay election funds

■ Both accused of placing illegal advertisements during '96 campaign.

By JONATHAN D. SALANT
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Government auditors recommended Tuesday that President Clinton repay $7 million and Republican nominee Bob Dole pay back $17.7 million in federal funds that went to their 1996 presidential bids, saying both illegally benefited from issue advertisements run by their political parties.

The repayments from candidates to the U.S. Treasury are the highest ever recommended by Federal Election Commission auditors, eclipsing the $4 million figure for Clinton's 1992 campaign.

The findings, which already have prompted a separate Department of Justice investigation into the legality of the ads, are to be reviewed Thursday by the six-member commission that oversees political fund raising. The commissioners, three from each dominant party, can accept, reject or alter the repayment figures.

Lawyers for both Clinton and Dole said the recommendations were excessive and the advertisements at issue were legal. Clinton's lawyers said they would challenge the findings.

Committee approves subpoenas of memos

■ Memos contain evidence concerning Clinton, former fund-raiser John Huang.

By LARRY MARGASAK
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Just weeks before their self-imposed impeachment deadline, Republicans on the House Judiciary Committee approved subpoenas Tuesday seeking fund-raising evidence against President Clinton. Several said they didn't expect the move to alter the course or timing of their inquiry.

Democrats from House Minority Leader Dick Gephardt on down ridiculed the move, approved on a 20-15 party-line vote, as an attempt to appease the president's most conservative critics.

After the vote, Republican committee lawyers went to court for a second time in an effort to persuade a federal judge to seek internal Justice Department memos in which top law enforcement officials laid out fund-raising evidence against Clinton in arguing for the appointment of a special prosecutor.

U.S. District Judge Norma Holloway Johnson on Friday had issued a sealed ruling that the committee had not demonstrated a sufficient need for the memos, which include secret grand jury material. Committee Republicans believe the subpoena will strengthen their argument, said panel spokesman Paul McNulty.

The committee also subpoenaed material from Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr on John Huang, a former Democratic fund-raiser whose ex-employer paid money to presidential friend Webster Hubbell. Starr is investigating whether that payment and other consulting fees represented "hush money" to keep Hubbell quiet about any wrongdoing by the president.

THE SOBER TRUTH

Alcohol awareness program teaches students consequences of drinking

After taking a field sobriety test, April Rishel, sophomore in elementary education, was placed under arrest Monday night in the basement of Moore Hall.

Housing officer Gary Marshall accused her of driving under the influence of alcohol, handcuffed her and informed her of her rights in a mock field-sobriety test.

Rishel was one of 360 residents who participated in an alcohol awareness program in Moore Hall on Monday and Tuesday nights.

The program, sponsored by Moore Hall resident assistants, was designed to lead residents through six different stations where they were confronted with a situation involving alcohol.

Rishel, after being chosen from a group of residents, participated in the field-sobriety test station. She was asked to put on a pair of goggles designed to simulate an alcohol content level between 0.17 and 0.20 percent. The legal alcohol content level for driving in Kansas is .08 percent.

Marshall, who conducted the test, asked Rishel to take nine steps heel to toe and then turn around and do the same thing.

"I got to nine, and I couldn't see anything,"

Rishel said. "The goggles were blurry and thick. It was hard to see my shoes."

Marshall then explained to residents what typically happens to a person with multiple DUIs. He said that if it is a first offense, the person will go to jail and be fined at least $300. After that, the fine and the jail time increases. Drivers' licenses might be taken away or an interlock device, which measures a person's alcohol level before starting a car, must be placed in the car.

At another station, residents were led into a bathroom only to find a woman lying on the floor surrounded by vomit. A man was standing over her talking in a slurred voice and stumbling over himself.

This was an alcohol poisoning demonstration. Eddie Savage, sea crew lieutenant with the Riley County Emergency Medical Services, said he sees a lot of situations like the one demonstrated.

He said it's important to put people who pass out on their side, otherwise vomit can get stuck in the airway and enter the lungs.

Savage said the average blood alcohol level

McEntire to perform at Country Stampede

Country music singer Reba McEntire will join 17 other artists and groups at next summer's Country Stampede concert in Tuttle Creek State Park, the office announced Tuesday.

The fourth-annual concert, which draws thousands of music fans from several states, will be June 25-27. Tickets and campsites go on sale Dec. 12.

Other acts scheduled for the concert include the Dixie Chicks, Faith Hill, Sawyer Brown, Diamond Rio, John Michael Montgomery, Chris LeDoux and Joe Diffie.

One-day tickets are $30 until April 15; three-day passes to the event are $60 until that date. VIP seats are $325 for the concert.

The concert's Manhattan office will sell tickets by phone at 539-2222.

Hearing set for pupil who took gun to class

PITTSBURG, Kan. — Education officials will determine next week if they will order a yearlong suspension for an 8-year-old student who brought an unloaded handgun to school and showed it to his classmates during recess.

Superintendent John Keiter said the student was one of two third-graders who brought guns to Westside Elementary School on Nov. 20. One of the guns was a toy; the other was a real firearm.

The student who brought the real handgun showed it to other students on the playground, Keiter said. He said the handgun was not loaded, and no one was threatened or harmed.

Keiter said the district became aware of the situation Nov. 24, when parents of other students called to report the incident. He said both students were suspended for five days after an initial investigation indicated both guns were toys.

During the Thanksgiving holiday, however, the student told his parents he had taken a real gun to school. The parents called the school Nov. 27 and told officials the firearm was real.

State law requires the immediate expulsion for one calendar year of any student who brings a firearm onto school property or to a school function.

Keiter said the hearing for a long-term suspension has been scheduled for Monday. The student will stay suspended until that time. The other student will be allowed to return to school after the five-day suspension.

Keiter said teachers have been told to ask students to show them the contents of their backpacks. And he said parents also should make routine checks of the children's belongings.

"It is everyone's job to keep the schools safe," Keiter said. "I would like to see parents who have firearms at home keep them locked up away from kids."

Police Chief Mike Hall said the incident was investigated by the Pittsburg Police Department, and a report has been forwarded to the county attorney.

Boeing to cut 20,000 jobs in next 2 years

SEATTLE — Boeing Co. said Tuesday it will cut an additional 20,000 workers during the next two years as the company scales back production of several commercial jet lines due largely to slackening demand because of the Asian economic crisis.

The new cuts will bring the total reductions in Boeing's work force to 48,000 jobs, or a 20-percent drop from the high level of 238,000 reached in June of this year. In July, the company announced it would trim 28,000 jobs.

"Clearly, the economic slowdown in Asia is driving air traffic down, which impacts our customers' plans and operations," Alan Mulally, Boeing Commercial Airplane Group president said Tuesday. "Our actions today will match production to market demand to support our customers."

Boeing, which early had projected 1999 net earnings at about $2 billion, now said it was forecasting next year's profits at $1.5 billion to $1.8 billion. It said 1998 profits were expected to be slightly above $1 billion, as earlier forecast.

Boeing presently produces 51 planes a month, spokesman Larry McCracken said. He said that will drop to 47 at the end of next year and 38.5 planes a month by the end of 2000.

The company said it would reduce production of 747 jetliners from 3.5 to two airplanes per month late next year and to just one per month in early 2000 if market conditions fail to improve.

Production of 757 jetliners will drop from five to four airplanes per month and the 767 program will drop from four to 3.5 airplanes per month in early 2000.

The 777 program, currently scheduled to be reduced from seven to five planes per month in fourth quarter of 1999, is now projected to remain at the lower rate in 2000.

Boeing will increase production on its new-generation 737s as scheduled to 24 planes per month, and it will remain at that rate until late 2000 when it will decrease to 21 a month.

Air traffic growth in many Asian markets has plummeted as the countries grapple with their worst currency crisis in decades.

Exxon, Mobil merge; 9,000 jobs to be lost

NEW YORK — Exxon agreed to buy Mobil for $73.7 billion Tuesday in a deal that would create the largest corporation in the world and put back together two of the biggest pieces from the 1911 breakup of John D. Rockefeller's Standard Oil.

Roughly 9,000 jobs will be eliminated worldwide as a result of the takeover, or about 7 percent of the companies' combined work force of 123,000, Exxon chairman Lee Raymond said.

Despite the new company's vast reach, a world oil glut is expected to keep pump prices at rock-bottom levels for now. Analysts said they also expect the companies will have to sell off numerous gas stations and refineries to satisfy antitrust regulators.

The deal is the latest example of rapid consolidation in an industry whose profits have been cut by worldwide overproduction, weak demand and slumping prices.

"We need to face some facts. The world has changed," Mobil chairman Lucio Noto said. "The easy things are behind us."

The company will be known as Exxon Mobil Corp. There will continue to be Mobil and Exxon gas stations, as well as the Exxon tiger and Mobil's red Pegasus logo.

Bowl game packages often exclude tickets

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Newspaper advertisements promising trips to college bowl games often leave out a crucial detail — the packages don't always include tickets to the game.

As travelers make plans to attend the Rose Bowl and other college football bowl games, the Department of Transportation warned Tuesday consumers should look carefully at brochures and advertisement material to see what is included.

Unless an advertisement specifically mentions a game ticket is included, it probably is not, the department said. Consumers should ask for the ticket at the time they purchase the package or written confirmation that the ticket will be provided.

Operators marketing packages to bowl games must have the game tickets on hand or under written contract at the time they sell the package.

If a tour operator receives a booking for which no ticket exists or is available, the payment must be returned to the consumer within three days. Consumers also may cancel and receive a full refund for their package if the cost of the tour increases by more than 10 percent to include the ticket. If a consumer is promised a ticket but does not receive it, the operator must refund the entire price of the tour.

The department extended its rules to cover college bowl games after the 1994 Rose Bowl when many fans learned their air tour packages did not include promised tickets to the game or that they would have to pay hundreds of additional dollars to receive the tickets.

INSPECT

inspected on a regular basis is because landlords vote and are in the city to stay," he said. Students, on the other hand, are less likely to voice their opinions and are more transient.

Variances sometimes granted

The ease of receiving variances from the Manhattan Housing Appeals Board has led to complaints from local residents.

Political motivation is a possible reason behind what some believe to be an excess of variances granted. A variance allows rental property owners to disregard inspection violations from city code inspectors.

"They are not fixing them," said Emie Wiechman, director of Consumer and Tenant Affairs. "They are getting variances granted, and year after year they keep renting out fire traps."

Consumer and Tenant Affairs deals with landlord and tenant disputes and tells students their legal options. Wiechman said landlords are receiving notices of code violations from inspectors but then get around them because it is easy to obtain a variance.

She said there might be bias on the board because members are aware landlords typically are voters, but students are not.

"Landlords are here in town to stay and are the voters," she said. "Students are in and out all of the time."

Bill Muir, vice chairman of the Housing Board of Appeals, said variances only are given in cases where strict enforcement is not in the best interest of the community.

The board often grants variances for ceiling height violations because fixing it would be expensive, and the tenant would have to find somewhere else to live while repairs were being made.

"I don't think they want the structure shut down six months while they are repairing an I-beam," he said.

The board meets each month and usually visits one to five locations to discuss whether variances are appropriate in each situation. The job of code services is to enforce the code of the Building Officials and Code Administrators International Inc. strictly. The five-member board then decides if the violation fits the criteria for receiving a variance.

"If somebody feels it is being too strictly enforced, then we come in and make a decision," he said.

Muir said he never has seen bias on the board or a case where a board member acted in self-interest.

"There are interpretations who is pro-landlord and who is pro-tenant. I would consider myself in the middle in finding the best solution for both parties," he said. "I have never seen any of the board members act in a way that protected their own interest."

Burnett said the board looks at each condition on an individual basis. He said he has not found any problems with its system.

"The board considers certain merits, and then they determine what they believe is the best resolution," he said.

Attorney says enforcement is key

Dianne Urban, attorney of legal services for students, dealt with 218 cases concerning landlord and tenant disputes in the fiscal year 1997-1998, though not all dealt with code violations.

She said landlords are getting variances for too many violations from the board.

"I just don't like the rules they are playing by," Urban said.

City records also make it difficult for prospective tenants to find past information about landlords. Violations at a certain address are available, but the violations of all the landlord's property are not.

Urban said the information easily could be cross-indexed to help tenants know the landlord's previous violations, which would make the city's records more consumer-friendly.

She said although Building Officials and Code Administrators' codes have strict requirements concerning the qualifications of board members, Manhattan has not adopted the same requirements in its ordinances.

"Basically, you have to be breathing and be a resident of Manhattan to be on the board," Urban said.

According to a letter from Wiechman concerning the board, she wrote, "One thing that could be changed is the standard for granting variances, i.e., permitting deviation from code requirements. Since a variance can be granted for a wide variety of code violations, the system makes a mockery of the housing code."

Muir said differing opinions of what is strict enforcement might be the reason some would have this opinion.

He said the main concern of the board is safety. By mitigating strict enforcement, he said board members find a way to help in situations where such enforcement is not the best solution for the community.

Urban said landlords might have too much influence in the community and are swaying board members. The only way to solve the problem is to enforce the codes.

"In order to get around them, you are supposed to have a very good reason. It should be such a unique situation that the codes don't apply in that circumstance," Urban said. "What we've got here is just nothing. I think the codes of the city are just worthless."

Other cities have annual inspections

Many of the cities with Big 12 Conference universities have regular inspections.

Micheal Childs, fire chief in Ames, Iowa, said the city does inspections on a three-year cycle. He said the program has worked well for the city because codes can be checked periodically.

"It gets people from the inspector's department in the buildings from time to time," he said.

The code department in Ames employs one full-time rental inspector and three assistants. The dates of the previous inspections are kept on file, allowing the code department to know when a certain property is up for inspection.

Childs said the inspections have decreased the number of fires in the city and saved lives.

"It's good because you have a mandatory program, to make sure everything is up to code," he said.

The Manhattan Department of Fire Services does require annual inspections of properties with three or more units to look for fire hazards. Code services, which is also a part of fire services, does code inspections for one- and two-unit properties.

Prieto said unless properties are inspected on a regular basis, a tragedy is likely to take the life of a K-State student.

"We pay taxes, and they should provide for everyone," Prieto said.

"There should be mandatory regulations that everybody lives with standard codes."

Residents were invited to look at autopsies of people killed by alcohol after West finished her story.

In the final station, residents were able to ask Bill Ark, director of Alcohol Education Service at University Counseling Services, questions about treatment.

"Sixty-five to 70 percent of alcoholics die drunk — most don't get treatment," Ark said.

INQUIRY

With the committee set to debate articles of impeachment next week, Rep. Asa Hutchinson, R-Ark., said, "The extraordinary odds are that this will not impact our timetable. It would be difficult to reconstitute this inquiry without some significant reason to do it."

Rep. George Gekas, a Republican committee member from Pennsylvania, said there wasn't enough time for campaign fund raising to have an effect on the inquiry this year.

"I don't want it to end this year," Gekas said, but he admitted he hadn't found other GOP members who shared his view.

Incoming Speaker Bob Livingston has said he wants the inquiry to end this year.

Meanwhile, Gephardt said that chaos is reigning in the impeachment inquiry and suggested outgoing Speaker Newt Gingrich or Livingston — who takes over next month — "needs to be given the responsibility, needs to take control."

The minority leader also wrote Gingrich that unless he assumes control, "this investigation will needlessly plague the next Congress."

Mark Corallo, Livingston's spokesman, said, "We haven't seen the letter yet. They are entitled to opinions."

Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass., a member of the committee, said the expansion represents "desperate face-saving" by committee Republicans "to show the right wing they tried in every way to win."

OUR VIEW

Accountability lax for city landlords

"We're glad you're here." Isn't that what all of the enrollment pamphlets say? People come to the Little Apple because they believe Manhattan is a safe environment. They believe the citizens of our city look out for one another, and they believe the mutual respect our citizens have will be shared with them when they choose to attend K-State.

For the most part, that's the feeling the administration and city officials try to convey, but that message gets mixed when you consider many of the thousands of students who live off-campus and are being forced to live in substandard housing.

Let's be clear on this issue. We would consider housing to be substandard if it violates Manhattan building codes — codes set by the city, state and federal governments to ensure the safety of the tenants who occupy Manhattan properties. The properties we are concerned most with are not the big, multi-unit operations surrounding campus. We are concerned with the decades-old houses for rent and the limited-unit apartments that occupy some of Manhattan's homes.

The problem with many of these places is they were built during a time when Manhattan building codes were nonexistent. Instead of renovating these buildings according to code, many landlords compounded the problem by cramming five or six apartment spaces into the houses and into rooms never meant to house individuals — where there aren't enough electrical sockets to keep people from using multiple power strips to run their appliances or where the ceiling hangs inches above the tenants' heads.

This is not the case for all of Manhattan's limited-unit housing, but it is the case for many. Without a mechanism for regular building inspection, apartments aren't checked. There are apartments in Manhattan that haven't been inspected for a number of years. Even buildings that have been inspected are subject to be granted variances for violations of building code. A variance is given like a get-out-of-jail-free card in a Monopoly game, and they're about as easy to get.

This is a problem that affects low-income families as much as it affects K-State students. Many landlords are responsible, but there is still plenty of room for some to take advantage of the captive audience we have in Manhattan. Many low-income families are dependent on the jobs that a regional center such as Manhattan provides. The students are captive because their education depends on living here. Last year the university attorney was involved in 218 code-violation cases on behalf of students. How many more cases involving low-income families weren't counted because they couldn't afford a lawyer?

These are families with children — how many were placed in jeopardy? The Manhattan community needs to be concerned about this issue, students included. We pay taxes just like everyone else.

We can take several steps to improve the situation. The Housing Appeals Board needs to give out fewer variances and make the buildings follow the legislated standards. A way to start is by declaring more rental spaces with code violations as uninhabitable. Force landlords to either fix the problem or have an empty apartment.

Additionally, students need to take it upon themselves to check the records on the houses they rent, to see when the last time the apartment was inspected and, if necessary, ask the landlord for an inspection before they choose to rent an apartment — provided there is reasonable suspicion the apartment they are choosing to lease might be violating code.

The city, in turn, needs to make records more accessible for students to check on their landlords. Violations on individual properties can be found, but a landlord with many properties isn't cross-referenced. It's hard to find out if the landlord is a consistent violator.

Finally, the city needs to have regular inspections for rental properties. Apartment inspections take about a half an hour, and by spacing inspections during a three-year-period, the city will have a way to police its landlords. The cost might be prohibitive, but if it is a choice between paying for inspections and dealing with the aftermath of a tragedy — not to mention the liability the city could face for ignoring its own code laws — the choice seems clear.

It's our responsibility to police our landlords.

The true reasons for the season

It's already December, and the Christmas season is in full swing. Everyone has heard the story of the first Christmas, but few people have been behind the scenes of the Christmas holiday. Where did it start, and why do we celebrate the way we do?

The most obvious and time-honored tradition of Christmas is the date, Dec. 25. Why was this date chosen? There are many reasons but not the one most of you probably have in mind. The holiday is seen as a largely Christian holiday, and Christianity is a very conglomerate religion. As it spread through the world, many local customs and ideas were incorporated.

This is the case for the date of Christmas. Mithraism was a very popular religion in ancient Persia, and it pegged Dec. 25 as the date of birth for the sun god Mithra. The Roman emperor Aurelian, who was influenced by Mithraism, declared Dec. 25 to be the official birthday of the "Invincible Sun" in the third century A.D. Another popular holiday for many ancient religions surrounded the winter solstice, which occurs around Dec. 21. Most ancient religions had festivals for the birth of the sun on the date of the winter solstice because it is the shortest day of the year.

Early and some modern Christians saw the celebration of one's birthday as sacrilegious self-worship. Therefore, they did not celebrate their own birthdays, and no one recorded the actual date of Christ's birth or even thought to do so until a few hundred years afterward.

By then, no one could be sure. Though the Bible does seem to give a general time frame in Luke 2:8, where it is written an angel of the Lord brought word of the savior's birth to the shepherds living in the fields and watching over their flocks by night. This would seem to indicate it was spring when shepherds watched their flocks by night because it is lambing season. In winter months, sheep usually are corralled at night and left otherwise unattended.

Pope St. Julius I, who served as Pope from 337-352 A.D., declared the date of Christ's birth to be Dec. 25 in an attempt to displace the pagan holidays of the winter solstice. The main competitor of Christianity at this time was Mithraism. The church also hoped to win converts by incorporating a winter festival into Christianity.

Early Christmas celebrations were far removed from the jubilant attitude of the modern holiday. Activities such as singing, decorating, giving gifts or even putting up a tree were seen as highly disrespectful to the sacred event. The General Court of Massachusetts in 1659 declared any celebration of Christmas, other than attending church, a finable offense. Lucky for us, festive activities have crept their way into tradition.

We all know the Christmas tree originated in Germany, as evidenced by the caroling favorite, "O Tannenbaum." How did it start? Legend has it that St. Boniface, a British monk, was preaching to a group of German druids. To prove to them the oak tree was not sacred, he cut one down before them. As it fell to the ground, it crushed everything in its path except for a lone fir sapling. In an attempt to win converts, he decided to incorporate their idolatry of trees. Boniface declared the surviving fir a miracle and said, "Let this be called the tree of the Christ Child." Early on, Germans planted fir saplings to celebrate Christmas. Decorating the trees came later. Protestant reformer Martin Luther most frequently is credited with being the first to put lights on a tree, in the form of candles. He got the idea after seeing starlight shining through evergreen trees one evening. The Christmas tree came to America with the Germans who settled in Pennsylvania.

Another common topic of misunderstanding is the abbreviation X-mas. Many people think the X is there to remove Christ from the holiday. The term originates from Greek, in which X is the first letter of Christ's name, Xristos. The meaning got mixed up in the translation. An equivalent term in English would be C-mas.

Christmas is a holiday rich in many cultures and religious ideas. In today's religiously tolerant society, I hope we can all respect the differences (knowing about Christmas adds more to the feeling of togetherness we share this time of year).

VIEWPOINT

JASON RUCKER

Adios, art, Anderson and architecture... Columnist bids adieu to Kansas with fond memories

Like Dorothy awakening from her adventures in Oz to find herself back in Kansas, perhaps in February when I awake for my first day of work in Los Angeles I'll be somewhat thankful to rouse from a Technicolor dream.

A dream that at times has been all too unreal (minus the hairy slippers) and occasionally frightening. If ever there was a student put through the purple wringer of old Bluemont College, it wasn't me.

I'd like to think I was cranking the wringer on all of you.

So, as the happy-go-lucky bon vivant I truly am, I'm going to share some of my sappy Oprah moments with you in hopes of finding out if any of us learned anything during my five-and-a-half year tenure as an architectural engineering student and moonlighting journalist. Ready, Johnboy?

Let's begin by recounting some of the ugliest things ever said to or about me in either print or e-mail (a long list in need of much editing, which I did for grammar's sake): "Your existence is totally irrelevant"; "Is there simply nobody over there who is informed on the arts?"; "horn-blowing ratchet jaw"; "You have no taste"; "worst columnist ever"; and the oft-repeated "gorgeous and insightful." (OK, so the last one was made up.) Or as administrators have chanted for the past three years: "Haven't you graduated, yet?" Considering the easy targets I've skewered — the administration, greek system, résumé mafia, Student Governing Association, athletics, artists and performers, chefs, architects, politicians, the administration and Gem, Kan. — the return comments are relatively timid.

It's baffling why these self-styled critics stopped short of running over me in their pickups and sport-utility vehicles. I've always relied on my critics to keep their arguments as uninformed and intellectually barren as possible, thereby freeing up valuable time I would be spending on rebuttals to do some odd chores — like sipping gin and tonics at Auntie Mae's Parlor whilst laughing hysterically at them. Don't take it too hard, kids, they make a mean gin and tonic. If I had a gin and tonic for every drunk student who has come up to me with a comment, I'd be a football player after game day.

Surely I've deserved some criticism. I've had good weeks and bad weeks but no regrets. You can't regret writing about earnest principles, but working full time as a student while trying to uphold some semblance of a full-time journalist is difficult. Occasionally, the work shows it in some less-than-great columns and stories.

In my esteemed role as a columnist and journalist, I've never tried to masquerade as anything but a student with an interest in learning. Whether that be learning about architecture, planning, art or politics, I've been educated just as much as I've tried to educate readers. If I've ever made a concerted effort at influencing students, it merely has been in carefully choosing the subjects to which I've dedicated my time.

I recognize that for every report on campus planning I've filed, a story on something else has gone uncovered. If I've ever been frustrated with how I'm viewed, it's when someone doesn't understand that if something goes ignored it is done so for a reason. Sometimes what isn't reported is as interesting as what is. Face it, the Collegian has extremely limited resources, and it never will be the usual city public relations where its prominent readers desire.

You bust your ass, and the man still ain't happy. Don't kid yourself. The man on this campus is generally an Anderson Hall bully who calls you at 8:05 in the morning to tell you why you shouldn't have said all those horrible, horrible things in the paper this morning. Well, boo-hoo. We who are about to speak our minds salute you.

While many might consider me a bitter old man-boy, there are swarms of faculty and students to whom I owe a great deal.

The faculty of the College of Architecture, Planning and Design have been invaluable and have helped me pinpoint ideas when I was shooting in the dark. That goes doubly for the Department of Art, jazz program, administration, Facilities Planning, library faculty, museum staff, arts leaders, city planners and assorted good-natured faculty willing to risk tenure-denial in order to speak freely on a campus or city issue.

And especially you, Scarecrow.

I'll never forget how you jumped to easy conclusions instead of trying to understand what I really was suggesting. Or how you patronized me during interviews only to laugh behind my back. Or how you came to Oz with preconceived notions, not wanting to accept that there are other people out there with other ideas that might differ from your own.

Enjoy it while it lasts, Hayseed, because this kid from Kansas isn't gonna help you get that brain no more.

Board suggests ending subsidized taxi service

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Transportation was the main topic of the City Commission meeting Tuesday night.

Presenting the annual report for the Social Services Advisory Board, SSAB Chair Don Roufa said Boys and Girls Club of Manhattan, Flint Hills Legal Services and most of the other nine agencies visited by the board show a dramatic need for better public transportation, but the SSAB had specific recommendations for the city-subsidized taxi program.

The program under Yellow Cab Co./Bell Taxi Trans Inc. provides low-cost transportation to the elderly and disabled with annual incomes below $14,000. Those who qualify can buy coupons for $2 each, redeemable for a cab ride within city limits. The coupons then are turned in to the city, which subsidizes the program with an additional 50 cents per coupon.

However, coupon sales have decreased an estimated 20 percent in 1997 and around 27 percent for 1998, Roufa said. In addition, increased complaints have cited two-hour waits, rude drivers and dispatchers, and unclean vehicles, he said.

The board's primary recommendation was to phase out the existing program during 1999 and transfer the services over to the Area Transportation Agency, a non-profit group supported by Riley County and the Area Agency on Aging, he said.

Glen Puett, co-owner of Yellow Cab Co./Bell Taxi Trans Inc., said the change would be counterproductive. "Naturally, I don't feel the ATA bus can give the service eight or nine cars can," Puett said.

Glen Nelson, director of the ATA bus, said he agreed.

"There is no way $20,000 and one vehicle can do the job the cab company is doing. In the meantime, I sure as the devil don't want to see us kill off what we've got and kill the ATA bus as well," Nelson said.

The commission voted unanimously to accept the report and take the recommendation under advisement.

In other business, the commission also unanimously approved a contract for the city to purchase compression equipment for the city's planned alternative fueling station.

The used equipment could be bought for $100,000 by the end of the year, one third of its price new, said Diane Stoddard, assistant to the city manager. The approved contract also included a site for the station at 620 S. Juliette St.

The station, part of an Environmental Protection Agency settlement for biosludge violations last spring, will cost at least another $60,000 to complete and will be able to fill vehicles that run on compressed natural gas once it is finished, Stoddard said.

Bazaar offers inexpensive gifts, raises funds for Hale

By DESIREE LAMBERSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Finish your holiday shopping and contribute to Hale Library at the same time.

Friends of the Library is sponsoring a Holiday Bazaar from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. each day until Friday on the library's second floor.

"Friends of the Library and the staff association are selling items for anyone to buy — books, calendars, computer games ... various items," said Jan Crow, director of marketing and public relations for Hale library.

Karen McCulloh, development officer for Hale, said anyone can afford the items for sale.

"They're all fairly inexpensive gifts; there's nothing over $10," she said. "We tried to keep it reasonable. I would say most of the things are around $5."

McCulloh said money raised will go toward collection acquisitions for the library. She said Friends of the Library tries different fund-raising methods each year; this is the first bazaar sponsored by the group.

McCulloh said the bazaar, which began Sunday, has done well.

"We've raised about $800 so far," she said. "It's been wonderful."

McCulloh said the items were donated by Friends of the Library, but they aren't used.

"The Friends of the Library donated new things that have not been used," she said. "This is not a garage sale."

McCulloh said people may also order finals week Goodie Boxes. The boxes, which cost $10, include cocoa mix, fruit, cookies and other items. They can be purchased at the bazaar or ordered for delivery during finals week.

McCulloh said customers also can enter a drawing for a Christmas wreath.

You'll want to remember your special memories and so will your family. Share your news in the Collegian

Former K-State assistant coach takes helm at Oklahoma

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Bob Stoops, a former K-State defensive coordinator, is the new head football coach at the University of Oklahoma.

Stoops replaces Coach John Blake. The announcement came Tuesday.

The defensive coordinator for the University of Florida's 1996 national championship team, Stoops has coached 10 bowl teams during his career and coached with Bill Snyder for seven seasons in Manhattan after working with him at Iowa.

During the weekly press conference, Snyder said he was pleased with Stoops' hiring at OU and the success he is having.

"Bobby is a tremendous football coach," Snyder said. "We were so proud of him when he was here, and I think he will have an impact in Norman."

"I know they'll like Bobby, and I think he will do a great job down there."

In 1995, Stoops guided a K-State defense that led the nation in total defense and was second in scoring defense.

Stoops was hired by Steve Spurrier,

Younger brother could follow Stoops to Norman, Okla., as assistant

Florida's head football coach, three seasons ago to bring defense to the offensive-minded Gators.

This year, Florida ranks fifth in rushing defense, allowing an average of 90.7 yards per game, and 11th in total defense allowing an average of 286.6 yards per game.

Snyder said Stoops' familiarity with K-State's team and program will cause him to adjust and make some changes now that the former Wildcat is back in the Big 12 Conference.

Stoops also is tied to the K-State program through his younger brother Mike, who replaced him as K-State's defensive coordinator and serves as assistant head coach.

Under Mike Stoops, the Cats' defense hasn't skipped a beat. This season, K-State's defense is ranked second in scoring defense and second in total defense. The Cats are sixth in pass-efficiency defense and seventh in rushing defense.

With his older brother now head coach at Oklahoma, the possibility of the two brothers reuniting in Norman has left Mike Stoops' future at K-State somewhat in question.

Snyder said he talked with Mike

Stoops about the situation and they decided it was important to focus on Texas A&M and the Big 12 Championship game in St. Louis before a decision was made.

"Mike and I have talked, and what I said to Mike was, 'Let's get through this ballgame and then talk,'" Snyder said.

Mike Stoops said he didn't want to discuss his own future but said he was excited for his brother's opportunity.

"You know, I'm not worried about that," Mike Stoops said. "At this point, I am just worried about this week's ballgame."

SECOND-HALF SURGE

Cats pull away from Loyola of Chicago after halftime; next up for Asbury's squad is intrastate rival Shockers

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It was a story of two halves for the K-State Wildcats on Tuesday night as the squad improved to 6-2 on the year, defeating the Loyola of Chicago Ramblers 80-52 at Bramlage Coliseum.

The win came after K-State found its rhythm in the second half following a miserable 36 percent shooting from the field in the first half.

After leading by only six at halftime, K-State came out firing in the second half when Josh Reid hung nine points on the Ramblers in the first 5 minutes en route to a game-high 16. The Cats outscored the Ramblers 49-27 in the second half.

"I wasn't hitting in the first half tonight," Reid said. "I tried taking it to the hole a few times, and they went to that zone defense. It kind of opened it up for me, and I made a few more jumpers."

Junior transfer Tony Kitt was in the starting lineup for K-State for the second-straight game. In his 21 minutes of action, Kitt pulled down 19 rebounds and scored 13 points. It was the second time in the last week he grabbed 19 boards, repeating his performance of the Cats' overtime win against Arizona State in the Maui Invitational.

Despite Kitt's play, the power forward said he wasn't sure why the team hasn't put two complete halves together this season.

"The first half was ugly," Kitt said. "I don't know what it was. We came out a little sluggish."

"We've played in spurts. We just have to learn to play real hard for 40 minutes. If we could do what we did the second half the whole game, it would have been a whole lot easier."

With the only bright spot in the Cats' first-half offense being an 11-0 run, K-State looked for a fresh start in the second when Ayome May started it off hitting on a jumper. From that point on, Reid took over. On back-to-back K-State possessions, Reid converted two three-point plays. Just two possessions later, Reid drained a trey at the top of the key to give the Cats a 44-27 lead.

From that point on, the Cats didn't let up. Leading 52-33 with 11:58 remaining, K-State went on a 15-4 scoring streak to push the lead to 30 points.

For the second-straight game, Manny Dies wasn't in the starting lineup for K-State, but he did play. Head coach Tom Asbury sat out Dies for the Georgia State game because he was late to the pregame meal. Dies found the basket for two field goals and two free throws for six points.

"We just have to get Manny and wake him up," Kitt said.

"It's like he's sleeping or taking a little nap or something."

"The sad part about it is that he's so dominant at practice. It's not showing on the court, but he's a good player, and he'll be all right."

K-State will be back in action next Tuesday at home against intrastate rival Wichita State. Game time is at 7:00 p.m.

Ayome May heads to Mayo Clinic for additional tests

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After returning to the K-State men's basketball team on Nov. 16, senior guard Ayome May, who left the team Nov. 2 because of a chronic intestinal illness, will undergo additional tests today at the Mayo Clinic, an outpatient medical facility in Minnesota.

May poured in seven points and grabbed four rebounds to help the Wildcats defeat Loyola of Chicago on Tuesday night.

In a Tuesday afternoon teleconference, head coach Tom Asbury said the purpose of May's trip is to get a further evaluation of his condition.

"We'd like to get to the bottom of this, because it's not something that just happens during the season," he said.

"This is something that goes year-round for him. When he's ill, there is nothing he can do about it."

Although May said he only should be gone a few days and not miss any more games, Asbury said he doesn't know how long May will be at the clinic.

"He may stay a week, I really don't know," Asbury said. "The best scenario is he will be gone two to three days. The worst scenario is he may stay through the weekend."

May will leave for Minnesota this morning with assistant athletic trainer Woody Graham.

"They will be running some tests," May said. "That is all I know."

May said he has symptoms such as stomach aches, lightheadedness and fatigue.

"It's been real tough, but I've been doing real well with it," he said. "Sometimes I feel fine. Other times, it's real bad. It comes and goes."

"They (the doctors) have pinpointed a lot of different things, but I really haven't taken anything to help it."

Asbury said he didn't know how May's absence would affect his game preparation.

MAY

"I don't know if it will affect his conditioning," he said. "Paco is smart. If he doesn't lose his condition, he will be OK."

"I'm not sure there is anything they can do that would take effect by the end of the season. How effective he can be, what remedies they can come up with really remains to be seen."

Information about May's testing at the Mayo Clinic was not widespread among his teammates. Senior forward Shawn Rhodes, who has played with May for four years, was unaware of the situation.

"I hope he keeps playing with us," he said. "Paco knows everything you need to know. He is a great all-around experienced player."

"I think him and the coaches are learning to deal with his problem. He has helped us out so much," Rhodes said.

Senior forward Ty Sims said May brings experience to the Wildcats.

"He does the little things," he said. "He plays hard and really helps out the guards. Cortez (Groves) really feeds off of him."

May has averaged 5.1 points in seven games, and just more than 19 minutes a game.

K-State's postseason picture might not be so bad after all

As much negative publicity as K-State's bowl whereabouts have generated in the Little Apple, I, for one, am quite content with the Cats' postseason picture.

Sure, I wish a spot in the world's biggest salsa bin, the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl, was secured, but that doesn't detract from my contentment with the three possible destinations awaiting the Cats — Fiesta if we're lucky, Sugar if we're not, and Cotton if we stink up the joint in St. Louis.

You see, the one thing K-State is assured of is not having to suffer the fate of playing in a bowl that bears no meaning. While the three above-mentioned bowls carry tradition, national prominence and a hefty paycheck, many others are in the postseason picture that serve as nothing more than a sorry excuse to throw two teams on the field in the name of consumerism. Not with me? Let's look over the bowl picture and see what we can find. There's the coveted Miron PC Bowl, which should pit a stellar 7-4 North Carolina State squad against fan-favorite Central Florida. Truly a matchup for the ages.

Or what about the Oahu Bowl? It seems the beautiful state of Hawaii wasn't happy with just one bowl game, so it added another. Thanks to this gesture, everyone's Christmas Day can be brightened with a grudge match between 7-4 Colorado and 6-5 North Carolina. Why? Because college football brings in the dough, regardless of the teams.

Somewhere in this gauntlet of corporate sponsors and holiday destinations, the soul of college football has been sold. Instead of a tough battle for

New Year's Day glory, schools can sleepwalk through a season and still earn a spot in the Motor City Bowl in scenic Detroit.

Thanks to Bill Snyder's coaching wisdom, the Wildcat faithful don't have to suffer the fate of Missouri.

This is in no way a knock on the Tigers' program, but how can they feel fulfilled after a tough 11-game season is rewarded with a possible spot in the Insight.com Bowl? This isn't the kind of bowl you reminisce about 50 years down the road. What's the payout for this kind of bowl, 100 free hours online?

It's not just mighty Mizzou that has a less-than-traditional bowl destination awaiting them. For other lucky contestants, a December date with the Music City Bowl awaits, deep in the heart of Nashville. If country isn't your thing, Idaho's Humanitarian Bowl — where the payoff for the game is knowing you're a good, good person — could make a nice holiday destination.

If you think these bowl oddities are bad, a look into the past reveals titles that would make Woody Hayes cringe.

From the Carquest Bowl to the John Hancock Bowl, numerous bowls rightfully have gone the way of the Dodo bird.

Thank goodness the Independence Bowl found a new sponsor. Now, no one else must suffer the fate of suiting up for the Poulan WeedEater Independence Bowl.

Fiesta Bowl invitation or not, Cats are still true champions

This week, Manhattan is being overcome with a certain apprehensiveness. It is a feeling tough to describe. It is the kind of feeling you get just before you receive bad news or are waiting for a dating partner to make up his or her mind.

If the Nebraska victory was the biggest victory in K-State history, then this week is judgment day for K-State and its year-long battle with the polls.

A battle that unfortunately, barring an upset, K-State looks destined to lose. Sadly, at this point there is nothing the Cats can do except win Saturday against Texas A&M and hope that either Tennessee or UCLA loses.

Still, it's sad to think that an undefeated dream season for K-State might not result in a berth in the Fiesta Bowl and that even with a win over Texas A&M, the Cats still might be deprived of the chance to play for the national title.

You have to feel for the seniors who have played for four years and have always dreamed of a national championship.

Your heart has to go out to all of K-State's fans, but particularly to the fans who have watched for 30 years and witnessed the team's early futility on Wagner Field. K-State fans have had to sit through far too many losing seasons.

A Big 12 Conference championship is K-State's next step in reaching greatness. With a win, K-State will have an undefeated season and, dependent on the aforementioned teams' performance, a national title game berth.

Honestly, I can't fathom the way that college football decides who is No. 1. Instead of allowing coaches and players to battle it out on the field, we allow polls and news media outlets to decide who the best team is.

The system needs to change, but it doesn't seem like the college football hierarchy wants a true No. 1, because if it did, it would implement a playoff system and allow the top-ranked teams to battle it out.

These teams deserve to play for a national championship and decide on the field who is No. 1, because a system that takes the national championship out of the players' hands and sticks them in the hands of outsiders to vote on is ridiculous. If we are going to do that, we might as well stop keeping track of points in games and just have an observer decide who won and who lost the game. I can see it now: Gene Siskel and Roger Ebert give the game two thumbs up.

That might sound absurd, but how much different is that than allowing players and coaches to play all year and then let polls tell them who is No. 1 and deserves to play for the national title?

At this point, it simply doesn't matter. A weak non-conference schedule has forced the Cats to play the game and hope either Tennessee or UCLA loses in order to play for the title.

So, barring an upset, where does that leave K-State football? Is a Big 12 title going to be enough for fans and K-State coaches and players? It depends on who you ask.

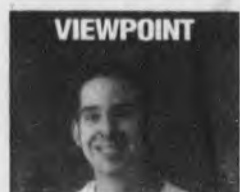

Earlier this year after the Nebraska game, K-State coach Bill Snyder asked members of the news media whether a loss to the Huskers would have diminished his team's accomplishments. After a moment of silence, Snyder told the room that if it would have, they were wrong.

Now K-State fans and those associated with the program need to ask themselves if the possibility of not playing for the national championship and a chance to be No. 1 takes away from K-State's accomplishments?

I don't think so, because in a system where there is no clear-cut champion, how can a team that has accomplished so much be looked at as anything but a champion?

The Cryptoquip is a substitution cipher in which one letter stands for another. If you think that X equals O, it will equal O throughout the puzzle. Single letters, short words and words using an apostrophe give you clues to locating vowels. Solution is by trial and error.

Barbara Waterman-Peters' art show opened Tuesday evening at the K-State Student Union art gallery. Her show will run through Dec. 18.

EMPOWERING ART

Feminist work portrays women of many ages, emotions

By RUSSELL FORTMEYER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's been a long time coming, but Barbara Waterman-Peters' master of fine arts show in the Union art gallery officially has revived feminist art at K-State.

Come to think of it, that's unfair. Waterman-Peters isn't a feminist — she's a humanist eager to promote an understanding of contemporary women.

You ask, just what is she reviving? Almost five years ago a show, "Virtual: Zenana," filled the Willard Gallery with art by women. It was a haphazard mess that quite prominently featured some shocking paintings of female genitalia. The rest was a hardscrabble mix of still lifes and portraits, with the occasional gem.

Since that infamous show, relatively few student artists have exhibited good, solid feminist art — something that effectively skirted the nose-dive into kitsch that so much bad feminist art does. Waterman-Peters, whose show continues until Dec. 18, uses kitsch to her advantage, using clowns as a vehicle of expression. Each painting is part of the larger My Women Series, or MWS, the artist has spent the past few years exploring.

Waterman-Peters paints with minimal color, texture and other formal elements, square canvases of women in various states of emotion and age: the young girl clown who is sad and forlorn; the middle-aged woman who experiences a range of contemporary feelings; and the old woman who is bitter, enraged and ghostly. The paintings are highly composed, with each successive work perfectly balanced so the women seem to inhabit the tiny gallery.

The presence of clowns suggests the ways some women have been trained to hide their feelings — ambition, love, intelligence or any other expression ever denied them. The artist wants these paintings to empower women to see past cultural stereotypes.

The middle-aged women in these paintings are youthful, unconventional, hard-edged and slightly industrial. Sigourney Weaver's Ripley character in the "Alien" films comes to mind. There's a natty beauty to them but also a fierce indifference.

In "MWS 355: The Search," oil on canvas, the female triplet of young, middle and old are crammed into a box, imprisoned by space and each expressing detachment. These women are isolated from an outside (one assumes) and from each other. In some instances, as perhaps is the case in "MWS 422: TS (ECHO) III," oil on canvas, they are isolated from themselves.

With such mature, socially conscientious work, Waterman-Peters' work is that rare feminist show worth arguing over. The show's highly ambiguous portraits and faint, dissolving narratives are just revealing enough to elicit a gamut of questions. That the artist takes a relatively uncritical view allows those questions meaning.

What is the context of their situation? Why would they want to hide something? Why would a woman in the happy-go-lucky state of Kansas paint such dark portraits?

"I've always identified with a lot of darkness," Waterman-Peters said. "It's protective, safe."

The artist's depiction of isolation is a real thing for her. She said her generation is a transition from older women who were afforded few opportunities in life outside the home and young girls who are granted those choices and freedoms.

It's clear the women in these portraits are somewhat wary of frank expression. Thank goodness for K-State, Waterman-Peters is not.

Museum offers crafting workshop

By ERIN MCGLINN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students can find out how to finish up their holiday gift lists before the chaos of finals with personalized crafts.

The Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art is having a fine arts crafts demonstration from 6:30 to 8:30 p.m. Thursday.

Katherine Schlageck, education and public arts director of the Beach Museum, will conduct the demonstration.

"The crafts will be based on the Kansas Artists Craftsman Association pieces, which are currently on display at the museum," Schlageck said.

"At 6:30, I will give a tour of the exhibition in order to help generate ideas before people create their crafts."

Schlageck said she will be displaying techniques to make items such as woven note cards, fabric, marbled paper, and clay bead and feather jewelry.

"We're focusing on creating things needed for the holiday season," she said. "By making your own designs like Christmas cards, gift wrap or tree ornaments, you can truly personalize a gift or decoration."

Schlageck said the projects are simple and don't require any special talents or artistic skills.

"The demonstration is open to everyone," she said, "so it would be a nice study break for a student or a good activity for a family. It is a wonderful opportunity for people to think about art and use that knowledge to make something fun."

Amy Hageman, junior in accounting, gallery attendant and office assistant at the museum, said plenty of spaces are available, but a phone reservation is appreciated to give the staff an estimation of expected numbers.

Hageman also said there is a $5 fee for the workshop.

"This is just a fee to purchase the materials needed to make the crafts," she said. "It doesn't limit you to just one craft item, so you can make as many projects as you want with this fee."

The demonstration combines the opportunity for those with creative minds to have a study break and a chance to make special, hand-crafted holiday gifts.

'80s metal lives on with new Crüe

■ Motley Crüe's hits CD approaches perfection.

By TL MEYER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Motley Crüe's "Greatest Hits" is exactly what it says, and any Crüe fan will appreciate it.

This compact disc has been a long time coming but is definitely worth the wait.

Hard rock or heavy metal fans of the late 1980s will recognize the CD's worth.

The album features 15 tracks pulled from the band's previous seven albums, plus two new songs, "Bitter Pill" and "Enslaved."

"Bitter Pill" sounds like traditional Motley Crüe, while "Enslaved," which champions individualism, tends to drag on a bit.

It's not that the "Enslaved" lyrics are bad, just simple and repetitive. Well-known favorites, such as "Girls, Girls, Girls" and "Smokin' In The Boys Room," also appear on the CD.

The album is close to perfection, but not quite. The Crüe's remix of "Glitter" is obnoxiously slow — listeners likely will be skipping to the next track as quick as they can and wondering if Motley Crüe is capable of performing slow rock songs.

However, the Crüe proves it can do just that with "Home Sweet Home," which features superb piano not often heard from metal bands, and on "Without You."

The Crüe is known for its fast-paced, hard-driving guitars and drums, and that is what it does best here with songs like "Dr. Feelgood," "Primal Scream" and "Too Fast For Love."

Except for almost six agonizing minutes of "Glitter," Motley Crüe's "Greatest Hits" is worth the price.

$23 million building on wish list for planners 4 nominated for Goldwater

By RUSSELL FORTMEYER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State could be looking to construct a $23 million classroom building sometime in the next 10 years.

Or it might not.

That building — a wish list item for campus planners — and other projects were discussed during Tuesday's Forum on Campus Development, the third forum on campus building issues since last December.

Jerry Carter, director of Facilities Planning and university architect, said the classroom building is a place-keeper, meaning if state money would materialize and was offered to K-State, the administration could apply it to a need at the bottom of the 10-year plan for new buildings.

"I think we need to be prepared to let the regents know we have a major building need on this campus," Carter said.

The university has a five-year and 10-year capital improvement plan. In the 10-year plan, for example, many projects currently are in construction, such as the K-State Student Union enhancement. However, projects such as the classroom building and the proposed $6 million renovation of Memorial Stadium are not currently priorities for fund raising or design.

The forums, which are organized every December and March, offer faculty, students and administrators the opportunity to discuss the way the campus is developing physically and to identify new facility needs.

At Tuesday's forum, about 30 faculty and administrators attended, along with one student member of the Campus Development Committee, which organizes the forums.

Vladimir Krstic, associate professor of architecture, said he hoped the university could develop a less traditional approach to its architecture and allow more discussion of architectural issues.

"We need to develop an atmosphere on this campus where we can discuss these projects in a collegial way," Krstic said.

Since last year's forum, the university has moved forward with plans to hire a professional planner to design a new campus master plan.

That project will cost $500,000 and calls for proposals should be going out in a few weeks in the Kansas design community.

That was good news for Mark Shapiro, head of the Department of Architecture. Shapiro suggested at last December's forum that the university move toward hiring a professional planner to create a more comprehensive planning document and physical model, as opposed to the Development Committee's "People, Principles and Process" document that describes how projects should be developed.

However, Shapiro said the university should consider dealing with current projects undergoing development that would be built before the planner is hired.

He said the committee should discuss how those projects apply to its planning document's principles.

"It seems to me all of those projects up here are being considered in isolation," Shapiro said, referring to the project display boards scattered around the Big 12 Room.

Early conceptual drawings of the addition to Ackert Hall were among those boards.

That project is being developed, in part, with money from the $32.4 million Crumbling Classrooms program.

Helen Cooper, assistant director for Facilities Planning, said the classrooms project has allowed the university to make many needed improvements.

She said the recent addition of an elevator to Kedzie Hall has allowed the Department of Philosophy to be accessible for the first time.

"It's not just about buildings — an elevator makes a program accessible that has never been in the past," Cooper said. "This is a unique opportunity."

A K-State selection committee has announced its four nominees for the Goldwater Scholarship, Beth Powers, chair of the Goldwater selection committee said.

The national scholarship is for undergraduate students majoring in science, math or engineering who are planning a researched-based career, Powers said.

K-State's nominees are Matt Crawley, junior in physics; Brian Keller, sophomore in microbiology and pre-med; Sandra Koo, sophomore in microbiology and chemistry; and Peter Pauzaskie, sophomore in chemistry, chemical engineering and math.

K-State students have won 11 Goldwater Scholarships in the last three years and leads the nation in the number of Truman, Rhodes, Marshall and Goldwater scholarships.

Goldwater Scholarships are awarded each year to about 300 undergraduate students. The scholarship pays for recipients' tuition, books, room and board for up to $7,500 per eligible year.

The Goldwater's selection committee included eight professors from K-State's science, math and engineering departments.

Ruth Dyer, assistant to the provost and committee member, said members looked for a variety of traits when choosing nominees.

"We looked to see whether or not they are active in research," she said. "We looked for good evidence of scholarship and the level of difficulty of their courses."

Crawley said he was thrilled with the nomination and expects K-State to fair well.

"I was really excited," he said. "I applied in the past, and this time my effort really paid off."

"I think the four of us will do really well," he said.

The national nominations must be submitted by January.

Recipients will be announced in the spring.

State institutions selling, relinquishing work of Curry, Parks

By RUSSELL FORTMEYER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This fall has been a banner one for Kansas artists with the opening of a retrospective of the work of artist John Stuart Curry and the honoring of artist Gordon Parks.

But just as interest and local pride in these hometown talents is at a high in Kansas, two significant state institutions recently sold or relinquished examples of their work.

In September, the Wichita Center for the Arts sold its one Curry painting, "Trapezist," (1932) for $55,000 at an auction to raise funds for its endowment. The center also sold "Missouri in Autumn," (1952), a painting by Missouri artist and Curry compatriot Thomas Hart Benton. It fetched $400,000 in the sale. In 1995, Wichita State University's Edwin Ulrich Museum of Art sent a large collection of loaned Parks' photographs back to the artist.

"The Wichita Center for the Arts' decision to sell the Curry painting was an ill-advised effort to create an endowment," Don Lambert, Kansas Arts Commission member, said.

Lambert, a Topekan, has compiled a catalog of Curry's work in Kansas and performs a one-man show based on Curry's life.

Howard Ellington, director of the arts center, said the endowment expansion is for the center's three divisions — theater, exhibition space and the school.

"The Board of Trustees approved deaccessioning things specifically to benefit the endowment of the gallery," Ellington said.

"The money benefits the conservation of the collection and funds the staff."

The 78-year-old arts center's collection is 6,000 pieces, with an emphasis on decorative arts, ceramics, paintings and jewelry. At one time, the school was directed by William Dickerson, the late Kansas painter who recently had a retrospective at the Marianna Kistler

The Wichita Eagle, others question right to sell works for non-collection needs

Beach Museum of Art.

"The focus of the collection is to represent people who either went to school here, taught here or are otherwise associated with the center," Ellington said.

Ellington said the Curry painting, a gift, has no restrictions. He said the board felt the money was more important for the endowment than keeping the painting. The Curry, along with the Benton, was bid on by another art institution but eventually ended up in private hands.

The Sept. 18 editorial in The Wichita Eagle questioned the ethics of selling paintings from a collection to use money for non-collection needs, such as the center's education program. The editorial also stated the Wichita Art Museum was in no position to purchase the paintings because it would jeopardize its accreditation with the American Association of Museums, due to lingering questions of what the endowment will be used for.

The Beach Museum is not AAM accredited, but senior curator Bill North attended the auction as an observer. The Beach is working toward AAM accreditation.

North said he found out about the auction from friends because the arts center did not formally contact state arts institutions.

"One of the great ironies is the center recently issued a color brochure to promote the center, and on the front was an illustration of the Benton they auctioned off that night," North said.

"I was troubled not only by the sale of these works but by the manner in which it was done."

North, who compared the auction to having a hollow feeling in the air, said it's a shame that the paintings auctioned were not offered first to public institutions in order to keep them in the public domain and within Kansas. The Curry painting was sold to a private, out-of-state collector.

"They were auctioning off part of the state's heritage," he said.

In the case of the Ulrich, Parks had loaned the museum the photographs in 1982 when a touring exhibition was organized.

In 1992, that tour was completed and the museum stored the photographs until 1995.

"We requested we terminate the loan because we were going into a major renovation and had no place to store them," Don Knaub, director of the Ulrich Museum, said.

"The university gave Mr. Parks every opportunity to make them a gift to us, but there's only so far one can go in asking an artist to give a gift."

The collection of photographs the Ulrich had now are in the Library of Congress.

A retrospective of Parks' work will open in May 1999 at the Ulrich with a new collection of photographs. Those works have been given to the Corcoran Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C. As of now, no institution in Wichita has examples of Parks' work.

Curry's career is the subject of a retrospective at the Nelson-Atkins Museum of Art in Kansas City, Mo., that opened in October.

Both Curry and Parks are represented in the university art collection housed in the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

However, K-State's Parks collection is in too poor a condition to be exhibited in the museum.

Last month, North said he is hopeful that if money were available, the photographs eventually could be exhibited. As for now, they sit in storage.

GIFT GUIDE '98

A KANSAS STATE COLLEGE SPECIAL EDITION

A pecan pie, K-State crown roll, cinnamon rolls and cranberry bread all can be purchased at the K-State Student Union Stateroom. The items are sold annually by the Union Catering Services.

Holiday Shopping ON CAMPUS

WHEN IT COMES TO FINDING THE PERFECT GIFT, THE ANSWER MIGHT BE RIGHT UNDER YOUR NOSE

The time has come to deck the halls of local stores in search of holiday gifts.

One sure way to avoid traffic is to shop on campus, because

K-State is offering holiday gifts from food to books.

Renee Westgate, Call Hall dairy sales counter manager, said the dairy bar is offering cheese and sausage gift boxes for the holidays.

"It gets our product out there, and the proceeds we get go to purchase new equipment," she said.

The dairy bar has brochures available for mail orders, which will be taken until Dec. 20. All products are made at K-State, and prices range from $16 to $42.

The K-State Student Union's Catering Services also offers a variety of baked goods, which are sold in the Union Stateroom, said Mark Rafferty, catering director, whose 12-15 member staff produces the items for sale.

"We've got the K-State crown roll, which is our biggest seller," Rafferty said. The crown roll is a sweetbread garnished with pecans, cinnamon and cherries.

Other items for sale, Rafferty said, include tea cakes, pies, cinnamon rolls and a variety of breads.

One floor above the Union Stateroom in the Union Program Council office, two Santa Claus suits are available for rent from UPC's Special Events Committee for $30 a day.

"It's nothing we do to try to make money, but it's more of a service," Heide McBride, UPC program adviser, said. "We do get a pretty good amount of people wanting Santa suits."

Teto Henderson, UPC adviser, also said a variety of K-Staters have been known to rent the suits for the holidays.

"This is something UPC has done for years," Henderson said. "We've had professors rent them for their classes, and we've also had fraternities and sororities rent them for their holiday events."

UPC is offering the service from Dec. 1-22. It requires a $25 deposit, which is returned upon proper return of the suit.

Other holiday specials on campus include the K-State Union Bookstore's Angel Tree display and annual book sale.

From the Union bookstore's angel tree, shoppers may select an angel ornament bearing the name of an underprivileged child in the Manhattan area. If the shopper purchases a children's book to send to a child, they receive 25 percent off their purchase. Shoppers may choose to have their names placed on the tree as a tribute, and the book then is gift wrapped and sent to the Flint Hills Breadbasket, where it is sent to the child.

Carrie Mitchell, book division manager, said the program has been successful in years past, especially because of K-State students.

"We've given out several hundred books each year," she said. "Elementary education students will come in as a class project to purchase books, and that helps us out."

The bookstore's book sale, meanwhile, offers many opportunities for inexpensive holiday gifts.

"We've got hundreds of books, from children's books to coffee table books," Mitchell said. "They make great Christmas and holiday gifts. You can find just about any type of book you can imagine."

The holiday book sale runs through Dec. 16.

Students can make Manhattan home for their holiday season

By LAURAN COWDREY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan is a home away from home for the nearly 1,000 international students attending K-State, said Angie Pfeifer, assistant in the Office of Student Life.

As K-State students return home for the holidays, many international students find themselves torn between returning home or staying in Manhattan.

Emad Yaseen, president of the International Coordination Council, said he was planning to return to his home in Palestine over winter break, but complications kept him from doing so.

"I received an internship for next semester and I have to finish many things before going there," he said. "I will try my best over the summer to visit for at least two weeks."

Yaseen said there are many reasons why international students stay in Manhattan over breaks.

"There are many reasons for me or my friends to stay," Yaseen said. "The holidays is a time to catch up on what they are missing."

Over breaks, many of the computer labs and study areas will be empty and peaceful, Yaseen said. Much of the equipment is free, and you do not have to wait in line for project necessities.

Yaseen also said international students might stay in Manhattan due to expenses. To return home and still have spending money is a large issue.

"It is, moneywise, a problem. It is difficult, every occasion, to go home," he said.

With that in mind, another reason international students stay in Manhattan is so they can work over the holidays and earn money for later trips home, Yaseen said.

Derek Jackson, assistant director of the Department of Housing and Dining, said it is for this reason the university keeps two residence halls open over winter break.

For more than 10 years, K-State has provided this service not only to international students but anyone who might need to stay in Manhattan for the holidays.

Resident hall contracts do not account for the students when the university is closed, he said.

"We remain open out of a courtesy, a service," Jackson said.

Haymaker and Marlatt halls are the residence halls that will remain open over the break. This is decided by which residence halls have the most empty rooms. A survey also is sent out, and the halls with the greatest responses remain open.

A room in a residence hall may be reserved for any length of time, ranging from a day to the entire break, for $8 per night.

Jackson also said though the two residence halls will remain open, the dining facilities will not.

Yaseen said international students will arrange dinners two to three times a week either at restaurants or at someone's home as a chance to visit and take a break from studying.

"Maybe every two to three days we have a gathering or go places," he said. "I enjoy getting away every once in a while to refresh my mind."

International students also might plan small trips to close places like Chicago as a chance to get out of Manhattan, Yaseen said.

As for the religious aspects of the holidays, many international students means a variety of religions.

Yaseen, who is Muslim, said students invite each other to their homes to pray and celebrate. They also visit various community religious centers that have parties and dinners.

"We try to participate and be as involved as we can," he said.

Though living far away from home is difficult, like most of the international students, Yaseen has an optimistic attitude about his situation.

"We are out here for a goal," he said. "We have to be patient for what we want."

Jingling JESTERS Children's book has beat all odds

Sometimes a chuckle gets through despite a thick gloom, and sometimes a story gets published and captures readers despite expert advice to the contrary.

The publishing history of "The Jester Has Lost His Jingle" (The Jester Co. Inc. $20 hardcover), written by David Saltzman before his death from Hodgkin's disease in 1990, curiously parallels the story it tells — overcoming the odds with laughter and love: "So when you're feeling lonely, or sad, or bad, or blue, remember where laughter's hiding ... It's hiding inside of you!"

The tale tells of a medieval jester banished from a kingdom because no one could laugh anymore. His exile fast-forwards him and his sidekick, Pharley (or sidestick, for Pharley is a piece of wood), to the grumbly present, searching for the missing laughter.

Saltzman's parents promised him his book — a senior project at Yale — would be published and that it would be given free to children diagnosed with cancer.

But mainline publishers weren't interested, according to Barbara Saltzman, a former Los Angeles Times editor. It was too long and written in verse. So she and her husband, Joe Saltzman, a journalism professor at the University of Southern California, borrowed against their house and published and promoted it themselves. They sent it to renowned children's book author Maurice Sendak, who offered an afterword for the book. And it began to take off.

"Against all odds, 'The Jester Has Lost His Jingle' has become a grassroots phenomenon," Barbara Saltzman said. "Since its release in late 1995, it has sold nearly 250,000 copies, reaching the best-seller lists of the New York Times, Los Angeles Times, USA Today and Publishers Weekly — major achievements for a children's picture book from a new press."

She adds that nearly 30,000 copies of the book have been donated to children with cancer and special needs.

The author himself recalls in a note published at the end of the book that his Jester character pulled him out of his grief after his fatal diagnosis: "He literally walked over to me, put his hand on my shoulder and with a concerned look said: 'David, how come you're not laughing? Your cries sound just like laughs, so why not laugh instead of cry?'"

"He came to help me in my time of need, and my hope is that, if you let him, he will come alive within these pages and help you too."

Despite holiday beliefs, true reason for season should be family, friends not Santa, commercialism

As Christmases go, this is shaping up to be a good one.

My shopping is almost complete, and I have given up all hopes of trying not to gain weight during the holiday season.

I have to mention the shopping thing because this is the Collegian's holiday shopping guide. This special section is supposed to remind you of all of the shopping you still have to do and convince you to take your gift-buying-behind to a business advertised here.

It is hard to remember this season is anything more than an advertising ploy wrapped in swaddling clothes. A violent battle over the hottest toy of the season tends to take the joy out of me.

But if you ever lose sight of the meaning of the season, ask a child what the season means to them. I had to tap my own offspring for holiday cheer.

Thomas is nine years old and has a grasp of what the season is supposed to be about.

"Christmas is celebrated when Jesus was born and said that he was the son of God. And a lot of Jews liked him, and a lot of Jews didn't like him. When he got older, they put him on a cross and he died.

"No matter what you believe in, you should join family and enjoy your family, your good friends and your health," he said.

The younger son, Ethan, is seven. His views on Christmas are nestled between the religious and the traditional fat man.

"Santa Claus, we don't know if he is real or not. Santa Claus looks like he's big and fat, filled with cookies actually. He has a long beard. He wears red and white sweats, sort of. Santa calls his elves to make the toys. He checks his list of kids and sees if they are bad or good.

If they are bad, he gives them a lump of coal. If they are good, they get presents," Ethan said.

In the middle of his explanation of the big, fat, red and white guy he said, "Christmas is really not about the presents. Christmas is about when Jesus was born."

But then Ethan got back on track. "Santa calls his reindeer to get on the sleigh. You might already know what the reindeers' names are. They are magic reindeer because they can fly, and one of them has a red nose. He puts all the presents into his bag and puts it in his sleigh."

"If you have a chimney, he will go down it, but if you don't, he will go throughout your door really quietly. If you leave it locked, he might unlock the door but to be sure, I would leave the door unlocked."

"When he comes to our tree, he may have another list. He takes the presents and puts them by the tree. If you leave a plate of cookies, he will eat it. Next, he will come to your stocking and put small presents or candy in them."

"The reindeers wait for Santa on your roof," Ethan explains.

At seven years old, I am pretty sure Ethan knows the secret of Santa Claus but is fearful that if he lets on he will miss out on the presents. I plan on playing along for as long as he does.

I asked Ethan what the best thing about Christmas was.

"The best thing about Christmas is being with your family and having lots of joy," he said.

When I asked Ethan if that meant he would still be happy on Christmas if he didn't get any toys, he looked a little scared but said yes.

That is the true meaning of the holiday, sharing joy with your family and friends. No matter what your religious affiliation or lack thereof, this is the season to give love to one another. Just remember, love doesn't always have to come with a bow on top.

Wrap up nap time

BOSTON — The best gift you can give yourself during the holiday season is some restorative nap time, said William A. Anthony, professor of rehabilitation counseling at the Center for Psychiatric Rehabilitation at Sargent College, Boston University.

Anthony, author of "The Art of Napping," says napping can alleviate stress and enhance emotional and physical well-being — especially important when you've got a full plate of shopping, visiting and late-night socializing.

He suggests you can take a "preventive nap" to restore lost sleep or even a "preparatory nap" to charge up for a long evening.

Twenty minutes to an hour is the recommended time for a nap.

Wild turkey stuffin'

COLUMBIA, Mo. — You eat the turkey, but what does the turkey you eat eat?

If it's the farm-reared, supermarket product, it likely had a nutritious balance of corn, soybeans, vitamins and minerals, said Jeff Firman, poultry scientist at the University of Missouri-Columbia. Such a diet makes turkeys super-efficient at turning feed into meat, gaining about a pound for every 2-1/2 pounds of feed.

Wild turkeys eat whatever they can get. "Wild turkeys instinctively balance their diets," Firman said.

The average tom turkey can weigh between 23 and 35 pounds when it reaches the market, while the hen usually ranges from 12 to 15 pounds. Toms have more breast meat, but hens are more popular, Firman says. "Toms are bigger, so they have more meat on their bones. But the hens have a more desirable size for roasting, and their conformation is excellent."

Holiday shows on TV

Gifts and holiday entertaining are spotlighted in a series of broadcasts of Home & Garden Television this season.

Host Eric Boardman will demonstrate trendy new holiday gifts on "Great Gifts '98," scheduled at 8 p.m. ET Dec. 3 and 7 p.m. ET Dec. 20.

On "Carol Duvall's Christmas," the host and craft expert will introduce artisans from Michigan's northern lower peninsula who create holiday crafts. The show airs at 2 p.m. ET Dec. 7, 5 p.m. ET Dec. 13, and 9 p.m. ET Dec. 20.

Dixie Carter hosts "Southern Living — Our Holiday Memories," featuring Southern Living editors and other experts who suggest holiday projects, including decorating, foods and entertaining. The show also will include a segment about Colonial Williamsburg, Va. Programs air at 10 p.m. and 1 a.m. ET Dec. 9, and at 5 p.m. ET on Dec. 19.

Big bargains rule at start of shopping season

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Bargain hunters flocked to stores during the first days of the holiday shopping season, with merchants who offered deep discounts and low prices faring best over the Thanksgiving weekend.

"Price remains No. 1 on everyone's list, and we saw that shoppers would buy if they thought the price was right," said Kurt Barnard, a retail consultant and president of Barnard's Retail Trend Report in Upper Montclair, N.J.

Retailers are optimistic about the holiday season, thanks in part to the recent rise in consumer confidence and sharp gains on Wall Street.

But even in these healthy economic times, consumers put value above most else when making a purchase, and discount stores like Wal-Mart and Target were big winners over the opening weekend.

Many merchants are going to great lengths to encourage shoppers to buy early in the season, rather than wait until the days before and after Christmas when stores slash prices significantly to clear out inventories.

The biggest push came Friday after Thanksgiving when more merchants than ever opened before dawn and used incentives — ranging from giveaways to significant price cuts — to entice shoppers to arrive early.

The promotions drew record crowds to some malls, with some stores reporting that thousands of people were waiting for their doors to open.

"I saved $100," Joe DiMattia said proudly after he bought a new coat for his wife at the Quakerbridge Mall in Lawrence Township, N.J.

TeleCheck Services Inc., a check approval service, said the amount of sales paid for by check on Friday after Thanksgiving rose 4.4 percent from the same day a year ago.

Many stores, however, reported that sales slowed as the weekend progressed. That was attributed to fewer promotions and warmer-than-usual weather throughout much of the country.

"The stores that offered the great deals early on were absolutely the most successful this weekend," said Kimberly Baughman, general manager of the Great Lakes Crossing mall in Auburn Hills, Mich.

Many remained cautious, knowing that any stock market volatility or unusual weather in the coming weeks could keep shoppers home.

"People are feeling very upbeat," said John Konarski, vice president of research for the International Council of Shopping Centers, a New York-based trade group. "But they know most of their season is still to come."

Especially strong over the weekend were discount stores, which lured value-oriented consumers who like the wide selection of merchandise that's available under one roof.

Electronics and computer retailers also used price to their advantage. Best Buy, the consumer electronics chain, saw huge demand for a $599 IBM computer and printer package, as well as a $288 DVD player, which came with five movies.

Toy stores also found shoppers buying up discounted items, with many retailers offering price cuts on everything from Barbie dolls to Blue's Clues games. Crowds also gathered for the hard-to-find Furby dolls, which sold out of most stores within minutes of the doors opening.

Department stores continued to struggle, their already troubled businesses hurt by the warm weather in the Midwest and Northeast that inspired few shoppers to buy sweaters or winter coats.

Internet retailers also reported very strong sales. At Amazon.com, sales were four times what they were a year ago, while iQVC has seen sales triple.

Retailers now have 22 shopping days until Christmas, and they are counting on people to keep spending through the holiday season.

BANKING BOOKS

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

■ A history of the world can be gleaned from passages in the Bible, and the Bible has inspired some of the greatest art in the world. A confluence of art, history and the Bible is celebrated in "From Eden to Armageddon" (Shadow Mountain, $39.95), selected by Denny L. Brown. The choices include Thomas Cole's landscape, "The Subside of the Waters of the Deluge," Rembrandt's "Supper at Emmaus," DaVinci's "Last Supper," and Michelangelo's "The Sacrifice of Noah." The relevant passages accompany each picture.

■ How many Sarahs, Eves, Rachels, Ruths, Rebeccas or Hannahs do you know? They're common names passed down from uncommon women recorded in the Old Testament. Author Miki Raver brings them to life in "Listen to Her Voice: Women of the Hebrew Bible" (Chronicle Books, $27.50 hardcover). Passages from the Bible about each of 18 women are extracted, followed by the author's analysis and history.

■ As you savor your glass of red, consider that it took millions of years for the soils, or terroirs, of the Bordeaux region of France to evolve into the distinctive mix in which to grow the grapes that make the wine taste as it does. "Bordeaux" (Abbeville Press, $75 hardcover), by Michel Dovaz, traces the history and the processes that still produce some of the world's most treasured wines. Photographs are by Michel Guillard.

■ The war with the American colonies wasn't the only rebellious challenge faced by the British in the late 18th century. "The Year of Liberty: The Great Irish Rebellion of 1798" (Times Books, $35 hardcover), by Thomas Pakenham, recounts how Irish revolutionaries and the British government both miscalculated, resulting in one of the most violent and disastrous events in the history of Ireland.

■ Worrying about the Y2K problem is probably symptomatic of the human animal. "For thousands of years the effort to measure time and to create a workable calendar was one of the great struggles of humanity," writes David Ewing Duncan in "Calendar: Humanity's Epic Struggle to Determine a True and Accurate Year" (Avon Books, $23 hardcover). Everybody had to find a method to count the days until the harvest, to calculate when taxes were due or the exact moment to make a sacrifice to appease an angry god. The author covers the effort from pre-history to the Internet culture.

■ "Chasing Rickshaws" (Lonely Planet, $34.95 hardcover), by Tony Wheeler with photographs by Richard l'Anson, offers a look at that still-favored mode of Asian transportation. This is the travel publisher's first large format gift book.

daughter, dressed in wedding whites, to one showing a Tunisian shepherd braving a sandstorm.

■ A collection of black-and-white abstract photographs by Claire Yaffa is presented in "Light & Shadow" (Aperture, $25 hardcover), accompanied by poetry by Jeffery Beam and a foreword by Gordon Parks.

■ "Yellowstone" (Firefly, $24.95 paperback), by Norbert Rosing, is a pictorial appreciation of the first and favorite U.S. National Park.

■ Before there was a Mark McGwire, there were Reggie Jackson, Lou Brock, Ken Griffey Sr., Henry Aaron, Mike Schmidt and hundreds of other memorable players of the game played between the bases. "Reflections of the Game: Lives in Baseball" (Willow Creek Press, $29.50) is an affectionate look at the sport through the lens of Ronald C. Modra of Sports Illustrated.

■ New York has a special place in the hearts of sports fans, as Mayor Giuliani might tell you. In "East Side, West Side: Tales of New York Sporting Life" (Total Sports, $34.95 hardcover), Lawrence S. Ritter remembers not only Ebbets Field and the original Yankee Stadium but places like the Bronx Velodrome and Olympic Field in Harlem — and those who made them important like Smokey Joe Williams of the old Negro League and heavyweight champion Max Baer.

■ You won't find any gossipy tidbits here, but in some ways, it's a more humanly revealing picture of the former First Lady. "Cooking for Madam: Recipes and Reminiscences from the Home of Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis" (Scribner, $30 hardcover), by former nanny and cook Marta Sgubin, offers charming vignettes about family celebrations along with favorite recipes. You'll find her snapshots of Mrs. Onassis taking a big blow at a lighted birthday cake surrounded by her grandchildren.

■ "Journey to Beloved" (Hyperion, $40 hardcover) by Oprah Winfrey, with photographs by Ken Regan, is the star's diary of events during the filming of "Beloved," the Toni Morrison novel.

■ Probably no one knows how many Diana books have been published, but one worth looking at is "Diana: Portrait of a Princess" (Simon & Schuster, $35 hardcover), by Jayne Fincher. Fincher, the only woman accredited as a royal photographer, includes many pictures you haven't seen over and over and that reflect her close access to the late princess.

The elegant & Unusual

Special gifts for special people inspire either the grand gesture or a flash of imagination. Here are some of this holiday's hottest and rare picks.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

■ Simple, sinuous and pleasing, the Padova candle snuffer ($135), by Elsa Peretti for Tiffany & Co., is her modern take on the classic long-handled hinged snuffer. To go with it, choose her cobalt blue crystal candlestick in the Bone design ($125).

■ The ancient Egyptians regarded felines as deities, as demonstrated by the many cat statues that survive in museums. A reproduction statue of the Egyptian cat goddess Bastet ($90) is available through the Alexandria Catalog published by the Rosicrucian Egyptian Museum and Planetarium in San Jose, Calif. The 12-inch regal cat, thought to be the eye of the moon, can stand guard in the home or garden. For a catalog, call 1 (888) 767-2278.

■ For simple dazzle, consider a royal tiara. A replica of one worn by Britain's Queen Mary, with imitation drop pearls and diamante dazzle (about $654.36 via the exchange rate) is available from — where else — the Jewel House Shop at the Tower of London. Or choose a more modest pair of Prince of Wales Feathers earrings (about $16.32). To order, call (44) 171-680-9017 or fax (44) 171-481-1599. Shipping is extra.

■ Prized collectibles in sterling silver include small boxes to be carried or displayed. Buccellati goes zoological with boxes in the shapes of a crab ($1,850) or a turtle ($1,000). Cazenovia offers a textured silver seashell ($137.50), while Dean Thaxter creates a nouveau-style leaf abstract ($244). For simple elegance, there's a box with an engraved grid pattern ($48), from Charles Tomae & Son.

■ Are you on tenterhooks about the Y2K problem? No? Enjoy the countdown anyway, with the Millennium 2000 Countdown Clock ($24.95). It tells you the exact number of days, hours, minutes and seconds remaining until the turn of the new century.

■ Computers are everywhere but one that stands out, at least visually, is the hand-crafted Oberhofer computer system in solid mahogany or cherry hardwood, available through the Neiman Marcus Christmas Book. Here's the tab: monitor, $3,995; mouse, $350; keyboard, $650; mousepad, $50. The mouse is carved from one block of wood with continuous grain. The catalog is $6.50 and can be ordered by calling 1 (800) NEIMANS.

■ Think about delivering your gift in a gift — perhaps cookies — in a glittering stainless steel lidded box ($6.95) from Ikea. Just festoon it with a ribbon, and you've got a wrap.

■ The single drop diamond necklace is a '90s classic. According to the Diamond Information Center, a good quality solitaire necklace with a carat weight of .25 can be found at jewelers for as little as $299.

■ Definitely not traditional is Bulgari's Tondo pendant ($800), a bold circular pendant in stainless steel and gold with either a clover, heart, cross or sun in the center. Wear it with a leather lace ($170).

■ A bunting for the well-heeled baby, Revillon's Chinchilla Baby Backpack ($12,000) will get her used to the fancier things in life, early.

■ Destined to be a new classic, the Nouvelle Vague Ring in white or yellow 18K gold ($1,200) from Cartier is bold, simple, and engravable. The wide, substantial band is appropriate for both men and women.

■ Using lost wax molding to make a replica of a 96 B.C. silver tetradrachm of Apollo, a company called Treasures of Antiquity uses the copied rare coin to create a pendant set in a rare green gold ($10,500, or $18,500 with diamonds). The firm, an investment house specializing in ancient coins, has a line of rings, bracelets and other pieces based on coins dating from 500 B.C. to 1450 A.D.

The caring type

Make-A-Wish Ornament

An engravable pewter holiday ornament featuring three playful bears swinging on a crescent moon called "Wish Upon a Star" is being offered at Things Remembered stores around the country to benefit the Make-A-Wish Foundation.

The ornament, selling for $11.99 ($2 of which goes to the foundation), is a limited edition in line with the wish of a young Cleveland girl named Elysia, who died this year from astrocytoma, a form of cancer. Elysia had asked the Make-A-Wish Foundation to help her leave personalized gifts to the important people in her life. The Things Remembered store chain became involved in shopping for the gifts, and as a result developed the ornament, designed by Gloria Duchin.

"Elysia's story touched us, and we wanted to honor her through this ornament," Suzanne Sutter, Things Remembered president, said.

The Make-A-Wish Foundation works to grant the wishes of children with life-threatening illnesses.

Ties with true meaning

The molecular structure of drugs and vitamins used to help sick children has inspired designs for neckties for the Miracle Collection III, found at Jos. A. Bank Clothiers and benefiting pediatric research at Johns Hopkins Children's Center.

The ties, produced by Stonehenge Ltd. using advanced micrography from Florida State University, depict Vitamin K, Dilantin, Diazepam, Surfactant, Tagamet, Iron, Pseudoephedrine and Penicillin.

All profits from the ties, selling at $39.50 each, go to the research center.

Heifers help families

Somewhere in the United States or around the world, a family could help sustain itself if it had some livestock.

You can fund all or part of the cost through Heifer Project International, which provides animals and training for sustainable agriculture to needy families.

For example, a goat costs $120 (or a share, $10), which can supply a family with several quarts of milk each day. Extra milk can be sold or made into cheese, butter or yogurt. Pigs and sheep also cost $120. Heifers are $500 ($50 share); rabbits are $60, ($10 share); chicks, ducks and geese are $20; a package of bees is $30.

For information and a catalog, call 1 (800) 422-0474.

Tribute to a friend

On Christmas Eve, 1990, Diana Napper's best friend died of breast cancer.

Napper, an aspiring jewelry designer, decided to honor her memory by creating the "Glimmer of Hope" breast cancer pin, which has to date benefited the American Cancer Society and Allegheny General Hospital in Pittsburgh, Pa., by at least $100,000.

The pin has a teardrop Swarovski crystal, symbolic of tears, topped with a pearl, representing hope. It costs $30 plus shipping and handling, with $13 of that total going to breast cancer research.

To order, call 1 (800) GLIM-PIN.

Adopt a park bench

New York City's Central Park is arguably the country's most famous public park, and you have an opportunity to endow a bench there, permanently marked with the name of your honoree and a four-line dedication.

Through the Adopt-A-Bench program created by Central Park Conservancy trustee Phyllis Cerf Wagner, your $5,000 donation funds a lifetime gift of a bench with a stainless steel engraved plaque.

For information, call (212) 310-6613.

Good gifts for foodies

Share Our Strength, the anti-poverty, anti-hunger organization, has three benefit gifts for food and drink aficionados. The Caphalon Soup's On Pot ($59.99) is a 6-1/2-quart hard-anodized pot which accommodates family meals for soup, chili or stew. "We Are What We Ate" (Harcourt Brace, $12), is a collection of reminiscences by writers about what food does for the soul. And Dow's Christmas Port ($13.99) blends a selection of young ports matured in oak.

Shelter a homeless pet

Gandalf The Wizard-Clown is not fooling around when he offers his Magic Rising Wand and Magic Cards to benefit the Bide-A-Wee Animal Adoption Centers.

The wand ($3.95) rises up past your fingers as if guided by a secret force; the magic cards ($4.95) allow a budding magician to know in advance which card is being selected by a spectator.

Gandalf is donating 10 percent of the proceeds to Bide-A-Wee, a group of non-profit, no-kill shelters for homeless cats and dogs.

To order, call 1 (800) 388-0708 or write Gandalf The Magician, Box 190, Woodmere, N.Y. 11598. Shipping is included, but New York State residents must add sales tax.

Cards to benefit blind

This year's card to benefit the Hadley School for the Blind in Winnetka, Ill., features a stylized snow and tree scene, with greetings both printed and brailled.

Sponsored by the school's Woman's Board, the cards are $22 per box of 25 cards.

Proceeds go to the school, which helps more than 10,500 students from around the world study braille and other subjects through distance learning.

For information, call (847) 446-8111.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

■ Is your loved one a Texan, far from home and craving a bit of a jalapeño bite in his scrambled eggs? Then the Texan-in Exile Survival Rations basket ($34.95) from the Great Texas Line may be his salvation. Assembled by newsman-entrepreneur Barry Schlacter, this collection includes Texas delicacies made by family or individually owned outfits in the state: Corn Chipotle Salsa, Willy B's Texas Caviar, a.k.a. black-eyed pea dip; Brazos Bend Snack Mix, a spicy blend of cashews, peanuts, pepitas, rice crackers and roasted corn; the "Cordon Bubba Texas Cuisine," a collection of Texas recipes, compiled by Schlacter; and the official "Twang It, Dang It!" coffee mug, part of a campaign to preserve distinctive Texas speech.

To order, call 1 (800) 73-TEXAS.

■ The monks at the Our Lady of Guadalupe Trappist Abbey in Lafayette, Ore., have heard all the jokes about fruitcake. But the joke may be on anyone who passes up their dark, brandy-soaked Monastery Fruitcake, packed with pineapple, cherries, walnuts and pecans and treasured by food-conscious Oregonians. They also offer a Ginger Date Nut Cake, with dates, walnuts, pecans, cashews and ginger, soaked in brandy. Both cakes have the same price structure, but you can choose combinations: two 1-pound cakes are $18 (the minimum purchase); three 1-pound cakes are $25; and one 3-pound cake is $23.50. Or, if you prefer, there are two kinds of Biscotti — Honey Almond and Hazelnut Chocolate Chip — which can be ordered in any combination of two 10-ounce loaves ($16.50). Add a $3.95 shipping and handling charge for each destination.

Brother Patrick, who will take your order, describes the Abbey's bakery work as part of the monks' efforts to stay committed to a spiritual quest while getting the bills paid.

To order, call 1 (800) 294-0105, or fax (503) 852-7748.

■ For the ice-cream screamers on your list, a convenient and easy solution — Edy's or Dreyer's Grand Ice Cream gift certificates. The certificates are $4.65 toward a half-gallon of ice cream in any flavor. (The brand is known as Dreyer's in far-western states and Edy's in states east of the Rocky Mountains.)

To order, call 1 (888) 837-4438.

■ A taste of New England comes from Harbor Sweets, which offers a selection of chocolate treats in the shapes of shells, sea animals or medallions with ship or sports motifs. Among the selections are a golf assortment packed in an English Spode mug ($29.50) and a Dark Horse Collection, presented in a 19th century-style hat box, containing an assortment of filled candy boxes and a hunter's mug ($120).

To order, call 1 (800) 243-2115.

■ Ugly, but so alluring. Truffles, those linchpins of epicure, are now available through Urbani USA's first consumer catalog. Choose from fresh white Alba truffles or fresh black winter truffles (call for current prices), or perhaps flash-frozen whole black winter truffles ($240 for 7 ounces) or whole winter truffles ($175 for 3.5 ounces). The catalog also features mushrooms, caviars, salmon, foie gras, prosciutto and other delicacies.

Call 1 (800) 281-2330 for catalog or orders.

■ Caviar is the elegant gift you can carry or have mailed, since it requires no refrigeration until opened. Paramount offers, in 4-ounce sizes, Beluga Malossol, $225; Osetra Malossol, $140; and Sevruga Malossol, $98.

To order, call 1 (800) 99-CAVIAR.

■ Fresh from Suzanne's Muffins, order the All-Time Holiday Favorites, a dozen muffins, including Cranberry Orange Nut, Rum Raisin, Chocolate Cream Cheese, Chunky Apple, Pumpkin, and Cinnamon Chocolate Chip ($33.90, including shipping and handling).

To order, call 1 (800) 742-2403.

■ For cultivated retro, consider the Glendronach Vintage 1968, a carefully nurtured single malt scotch from Defenders of the Malt ($175 per bottle). This 25-year-old comes from the Highlands of Scotland in a limited release to the United States of only 7,200 bottles.

■ LuLu, the Provencal-inspired San Francisco restaurant, offers holiday assortments of vinegars, condiments and seasonings. Choose the five-vinegar assortment ($15.95) with 12.7-ounce corked bottles of Fig Balsamic, Black Cherry Balsamic, Currant Balsamic, Provencal Herb and Wild Fennel & Thyme.

For orders, call 1 (888) 693-5800.

■ A really rich gift is one of the specialties from Junior's Cheesecake of Brooklyn, N.Y. Among them are Black Forest, Raspberry Swirl, Brownie Marble and Chocolate Malted cheesecakes ($24.95 plus shipping and handling for 3-pound size).

Call 1 (800) 9-JUNIORS to order.

■ You've heard about the fine vineyards of California's small wineries, but you're not likely to find them at your local jug shop. A way to reach them is the Secret Cellars Wine Club. Each month, a member will receive a shipment of two bottles — usually a white and a red — from the featured winery. Cost, including shipping, is $32.50 for California members and $34.50 for those outside the state. Members can choose a limited or unlimited schedule of shipments to be billed to their credit cards.

For information and orders, call 1 (800) 997-VINO.

■ A five-bottle set of single malt scotch from Glenlivet called The Glenlivet Vintages, comes in a limited release from the Scottish distiller for the prime years of 1967, 1968, 1969, 1970 and 1972. Each bottle is authenticated, numbered and signed by the master distiller, William Lamb. A boxed set of 200 ml bottles is about $299.

■ Doughnut lovers dote on light, fluffy (and very trendy) Krispy Kreme Doughnuts, and you can satisfy them with gift certificates — $1 each, or if you want them supplied for a whole year, figure $180. They're available wherever the doughnuts are sold.

■ For a gift you can get your teeth into, send a steak from Butch Long's Steaks of Nebraska. Four lean extra-trim filet mignons, more than an inch thick, are $54.95; a 28-ounce tenderloin roast is $59.95, and for stir-fry fans, there are three 1-pound packages of tenderloin steak tips, a bargain at the sale price of $29.95. Add $9.95 for standard delivery.

For orders, call 1 (800) 579-0333.

■ Daytime television actress Susan Batten has an off-screen passion — southern food. Her Southern Food Country offers all sorts of treats suitable for holiday giving. For example, Grandmother's Chocolate Dipped Peanut Brittle ($21.95 for a 16-ounce tin), or Mrs. Jackson's Blue Ribbon Pickles ($16.75 for three 8-ounce jars), a collection of watermelon rind, sweet artichoke and green tomato pickles.

For orders or a catalog, call 1 (888) 311-6250.

■ Windsor Vineyards in California's Sonoma County will print personalized holiday greetings on select wines you choose as gifts. The 1995 Merlot, for example, sells for about $24 per bottle. Or buy a membership in the Home Tasting Club, which provides the recipient with different two-bottle gifts each month for three to 12 months ($81 to $321).

Academic advising resolution to go before Senate

By JAMI STUMP

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Improving the quality of academic advising for K-State students is the purpose of a resolution on the agenda for tonight's Student Senate meeting.

"What we are doing is establishing a baseline of expectations that students can have of academic advisers and advisers can have of their students," said Andy Macklin, student body vice president. "This is a starting point to improve advising on campus."

In a survey done through the Office of Educational Advancement, K-State seniors were asked if they received high-quality advising. Out of the 68 percent who responded to the survey, 60 percent said they were satisfied with their advising.

"We have fallen short in the expectations of students and parents in the form of academic advising," said Pat Bosco, associate vice president and dean of student life. "I believe that our students deserve better than a satisfaction rating from seniors of 60 percent. That rating is about the same as parking on campus."

The resolution places an emphasis on shared responsibility and a mutually beneficial relationship between the student and academic adviser.

It outlines five basic expectations that students should have of their advisers. They include direction in students' curricular decisions, assistance in achieving long-term goals and receiving an adviser's undivided attention.

According to the resolution, academic advisers should expect students to be prepared, punctual and open-minded; students should make an effort to communicate with their advisers.

"One of the most important things for students is that they think through their plans for the future," said Rhett Trujillo, Academic Affairs Committee chair. "Academic advisers are not supposed to have all of the answers. They are there to guide the student, not make decisions for them."

Though the resolution would provide a framework for advising standards, there is no way to enforce a policy that each adviser would be forced to follow. The legislation simply outlines improvements students would like to see in the process.

Macklin said the goal of the resolution is to help provide students with good advising, no matter what college they are in.

"There are some colleges on campus that have outstanding advising," Macklin said. "What we would like to see is a central position on campus to oversee academic advising along with the implementation of a system for evaluation of advisers."

Macklin said the administrative position, if established, would be a point of reference for students and advisers. That person would oversee and set standards for academic advising.

"Academic advising is a complex subject where not one single solution is going to bring consistency throughout the university," Bosco said. "K-State can't solve the problem of unevenness by ourselves, because this is a funding and priority issue. We have to come together and define student, academic-adviser, academic-dean and parent expectations on this issue."

The implementation of an academic adviser evaluation also is suggested in the resolution.

"Fort Hays State successfully performs academic advising assessments," Tracey Mann, student body president, said. "We would like to establish an assessment using them as a point of reference to start from."

Mann said student body presidents in the Kansas Board of Regents system have ranked academic advising as one of their five top issues to address this year.

THE FIRING LINE

Safety concerns surround firing range

STORY BY RUSSELL FORTMEYER ■ PHOTOGRAPHS BY STEVE HEBERT

When Matt Schneider signed up for a basic riflery class at K-State, he had no idea he would be dodging scraps of lead from bullet ricochets in the firing range.

"I was hit by one, but it wasn't hard enough to do damage," said Schneider, sophomore in pre-professional business administration.

After confiding his concern with the rampant ricochets to his instructor, Schneider said he was told to sit at the back of the classroom and dodge them.

Deflecting scraps of lead is just one of the safety considerations for students using the Tyler E. Houdek Memorial Range in the basement of Military Science Hall. Another, perhaps more serious, issue is the exposure to lead particles in the air and on surfaces — a byproduct of shooting soft lead bullets that can result in health problems if a person is exposed to it over a long duration of time.

The Department of Military Science is aware of all of these potential safety hazards, but thanks to a combination of a lack of personnel and little money to renovate outdated facilities, students are exposed to hazards that are rare at private firing ranges.

Facilities maintenance not always followed

Although ricochets — really small fragments of the .22-caliber lead bullets used in the range — do occur, no reported ricochet ever has accounted for a safety hazard or required medical attention. According to range staff, in the last year, the firing range has experienced no reported safety problems to the more than 50 students who use it in the Basic Riflery class offered by the military science department.

"The risk for people getting injured in the range or sick in the range is very low," said Capt. Robert Wallace, assistant professor of military science.

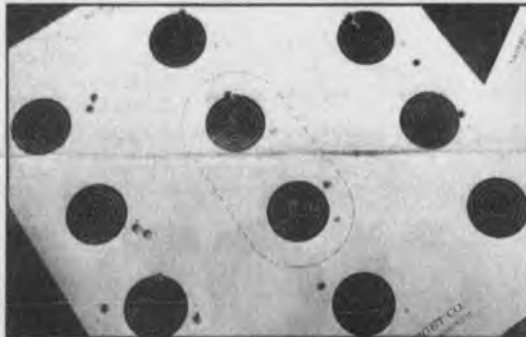

Still, Schneider said he thinks the potential for an accident is high due to poor range maintenance. He said one of the reasons he determined ricochets occur is because of lax maintenance of the lead traps behind the targets that catch the bullets. On one of his own inspections, Schneider took a photograph of a lead trap overflowing with bullet shards. He said he also thinks the concrete block back wall at the range increases the chance of splash back.

Steven Galitzer, director of public safety, said he has been assured students are adequately protected.

"If you look at the velocities and physical size, it doesn't seem like there's much of a hazard associated with it," Galitzer said.

However, students are getting hurt. In the past three weeks, Schneider said two students in his class have been hit by ricochets — one resulting in a cut under the eye and another in a welt under the arm. Those injuries were not reported to Wallace.

"If it's a serious injury, obviously, we'd be concerned,"

A shot-up target rests on a table after a Wednesday morning Basic Riflery class. The targets are used in the class for daily shooting practice. The Department of Military Science has opted to cancel the riflery course for next semester, but not due to safety considerations.

Wallace said. "I'm not sure if they were very serious to even warrant looking into it. With any lab, there are some small inherent risks."

Wallace said Sgt. Ezra Jackson asked the student with the cut if he would like to go to Lafene Health Center, but the student declined. He said incidents like these are common, and firing range injuries are never more serious than that. Students sign a release waiver at the beginning of the semester and wear safety glasses and ear protection while in the range.

These ricochets, which are called stringers by range staff, aren't akin to live bullets flying haphazardly around the range. Wallace said, "It feels like a small piece of grease hitting you. It's not like what you see in the movies with bullets going everywhere. That's the risk you have running a range. We've never had anyone hurt using it."

The range is divided between two areas — the classroom behind the firing line and the range itself with the targets and a sand floor. Only range staff is allowed behind the firing line and only when there is no activity by shooters. Surrounding the classroom are offices and a storage room where the rifles are kept in safes.

The cleaning and safety program for the range is part of a Standard Operating Procedure document. According to that document, lead trap overflows are to be cleaned daily. Jackson, who instructs the basic riflery course, said the traps are cleaned on a need-only basis, but generally every three months. As for the back wall, a 1992 Fort Riley safety office inspection concluded the back wall should be made of wood, though using .22-caliber soft-nose bullets would not pose a problem.

Referring to the lead traps, Wallace said, "They are not optimal, but they are certainly the best we can do with what we have."

Not all cleaning requirements as written in the SOP are Adam Balzer, senior in milling science, fires a .22-caliber rifle downrange at the Tyler E. Houdek Memorial Range in the basement of Military Science Hall. Students who use the range are exposed to lead particles that can result in health problems, and some have been hit by scraps of lead from bullet ricochets.

Landon Lecture chair hopes for busier spring

By TL MEYER

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Wondering why there were no Landon Lectures this semester?

Ask Monica Lewinsky.

Charles Reagan, assistant to President Jon Wefald, said it has been difficult to schedule dates for people who have accepted invitations to speak because many are from Washington, D.C., and don't want to leave the area.

"This is partly because of the presidential scandal," he said.

Once the impeachment process has quieted, those who have accepted invitations to speak will set dates, said Edward Seaton, chairman of the Landon Lecture Series Patrons, a group that contributes about $50,000 a year in support of the Landon Lecture Series.

Reagan said he is expecting a busy spring, with six people

ESU deletes sexual orientation from nondiscrimination clause

■ University of Missouri postpones its decision.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Recent decisions by the University of Missouri and Emporia State University on nondiscrimination clauses have upset gay, lesbian and bisexual groups in Kansas and Missouri.

A committee of the University of Missouri's governing board has decided to postpone a decision on whether the system's nondiscrimination clause should include explicit protection for gays, lesbians and bisexuals.

Also, on advice from a lawyer for the Kansas Board of Regents, the president of Emporia State has deleted sexual orientation from the university's nondiscrimination clause.

More than 200 other colleges and universities in the country — among them Kansas State University and the University of Kansas — include sexual orientation in their nondiscrimination clauses.

Varney's to expand into old theater

By NICK BRATKOVIC

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Owners of Varney's Book Store in Aggieville have purchased the Campus Theatre building for a planned expansion.

The bookstore, now at 623 N. Manhattan Ave., has been in Manhattan since 1908.

Cheryl Sieben, executive director of the Aggieville Business Association, said Varney's plans to move its children's section into the new theater.

Although Sieben didn't know Varney's exact plans for expansion, she said the store planned to keep the theater's original look on the outside.

"I'm really excited that they've chosen to keep the historic marquee in Aggieville," Sieben said.

Customer reaction at Varney's was mixed Wednesday night.

"I think it's kind of sad. I'd rather see it become a theater or something else other than that," Chad Glenn, senior in architecture, said. "I understand they are gonna keep the front, but that's not a real theater."

Along with the children's section, the theater-expansion area will house other items for mainstream readers.

Sieben said she was pleased with Varney's planned expansion.

"I just think it'll be a really nice addition, and I think it will be a positive anchor for Aggieville," she said.

The owners of Varney's could not be reached at press time.

New bill could resolve confusion on spending

Student senators are trying to clear up confusion resulting from a change in last year's campaign regulations.

Candidates for student body president in the 1997 Student Governing Association elections violated rules when they spent more than the $815 permitted for T-shirts.

In previous years, candidates had been allowed to purchase T-shirts and then sell them to supporters without having the cost of the shirts count toward the spending limit. Regulations were changed for the 1997 elections, but some candidates said they weren't aware of the new rule.

Student Senate then amended the regulations during the election, allowing the five candidates to continue their campaigns.

A new bill that would change spending rules was supposed to be voted on at last Thursday's meeting; after a long debate, senators sent the bill back to committee.

The bill would raise the amount of money candidates can spend on campaigning from $815 to $2,000, but it would limit the amount presidential tickets can spend on an election out of their own pockets to $1,000. The other $1,000 would have to be donated by outsiders.

T-shirts and other articles of clothing would count toward the $2,000 limit.

The bill's authors said they wanted to give more people the chance to run for office.

"Anyone with a following should be open to run. We want to try to keep elections more open to the average student," Josh Rengstorff, Operations Committee chair, said.

Joe Ashley, this year's elections chair and member of Student Body President Tracey Mann's cabinet, said the bill would replace last year's regulations that caused confusion.

"Right now, it is real ambiguous how much a campaign can spend," Ashley said. "It leaves it open to buying elections, so the bill is trying to limit so you can't spend as much."

Rengstorff said senators agree that SGA needs the change.

"Most people are in agreement it should change, but we have a lot of differing opinions on how to do it," he said.

The bill, which is up for debate at tonight's meeting, still could be amended, Rengstorff said. He declined to mention specifics.

"I have a feeling a lot of things could change," he said.

Rengstorff said the upcoming spring elections require decisions be made soon.

"Everyone wants to do it right," he said. "But we are coming up against a time crunch with spring election season coming up."

Poor wheat quality concerns state experts

HUTCHINSON, Kan. — Most of the Kansas winter wheat crop is in the ground and beginning to emerge, but some agriculture experts expressed concern with the early plant quality.

"Nearly a third of the wheat quality is rated just fair or poor," said state statistician Ron Sitzman. "That's a little scary. It's still got a long way to go, but you start to worry a little."

The wheat condition is listed as 17 percent excellent, 56 percent good, 22 percent fair, 4 percent poor and 1 percent very poor.

That compares with 77 percent good or excellent at this time in 1997 and 90 percent ranked that way in November 1996.

"I just took a trip to Dodge City, and you could tell some of the wheat did not have a good start," said Hutchinson Community College agronomy instructor Steven Sears. "Some of the fields were even torn up and replaced."

The crop condition is due in large part to the weather, first drought and then floods, which has plagued farmers trying to plant.

"Some didn't have the early moisture and had to 'dust' it in," Sitzman said, referring to a practice of planting the seed in dry ground and hoping that later moisture will allow it to germinate.

"Then we got floods."

The unseasonably warm conditions are allowing plants to continue to grow, which means the crop could recover before winter freezes put it into dormancy.

The best scenario for the crop is a gradual decline in temperatures, Sears said.

Harvard boosts yearly budget by $95 million

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — Harvard announced Wednesday it is increasing by at least 20 percent the amount of money it takes from its endowment and puts toward the university's annual operating budget.

That's a sizable leap for any university, but with an endowment hovering near $13 billion, it translates into a whopping $95 million yearly budget boost for Harvard.

When it comes to university endowments, Harvard is in a league of its own, and when Harvard shifts how it uses endowment funds, other schools notice.

"One reason why we're investing as much is because it really costs that much to stay excellent," said Harvard president Neil L. Rudenstine.

The additional money for the 1999-2000 school year will contribute to the university's undergraduate and eight professional schools and will be used to recruit new teachers, lower class size, improve technology and preserve threatened library books.

About $9 million will go toward financial aid for needy students. The increase, however, won't mean any reduction in tuition, Rudenstine said. A year at Harvard now costs an undergraduate $31,132 in tuition, room, board, books and other fees.

Despite recent fluctuations in the stock market, the last few years have been booming investment times for Harvard and other universities. At Harvard, the endowment returns have yielded close to 20 percent for five years.

"We've just plain been lucky in how well the markets have done, and so we want to share that," said Beppie Huidekoper, Harvard's vice president for finance.

Boys survive on beer while locked in boxcar

CINCINNATI — Two boys who hopped a freight train and got locked in a boxcar say they survived for more than a week by drinking the cargo — stale beer from mostly empty bottles being returned to a brewery.

"I didn't drink that much, just a little something to get my mouth wet," John Wayne Riley, 15, said Wednesday. He said he lost about 20 pounds during the ordeal.

Riley said he and 12-year-old Billy Ray Grimes Jr. had jumped onto a slow-moving train in Hamilton on Nov. 23 to escape a beating from a half-dozen thugs chasing them, but authorities are suspicious of that part of the story. Grimes said they were running away from home.

About two miles up the track, they switched to another train, which Riley said he thought was headed back to Hamilton, about 25 miles northwest of Cincinnati. Instead, it was bound for the Miller Brewing Co. rail yard at Trenton.

Somewhat, the boxcar doors slammed shut and locked, leaving the boys without heat, light, food or water. It was eight days later when brewery employees taking inventory in the rail yard heard someone pounding on the side of the boxcar, and the boys were freed.

"Every time I heard a noise, I'd scream, holler and beat on the walls," Riley said. "I don't think I would've made it another day. Those people saved our lives."

The boys, cold and hungry when they were freed Tuesday, were taken to a hospital where they were treated and released.

"We thought we was going to die," Grimes said. "We was thirsty and hungry, and we didn't have nothing to drink but some beer."

He said the boys used their shirts to strain the old beer in the bottles.

Dr. Barry Staley, a family practitioner in West Chester, said drinking the beer might have saved their lives by warding off dehydration.

Speaker traces history of HIV/AIDS, encourages change

By LAURAN COWDREY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tom Davis, HIV/AIDS educator for California Health Services, spoke on the history of HIV/AIDS on Wednesday as part of K-State's AIDS Awareness Week.

Every minute, five people are infected with HIV, and an estimated 30 million people around the world live with the virus, Davis said.

In fact, this is only the third decade of the disease, and most of today's college students have been alive since the beginning of the disease, first noted in 1979, he said.

There have been a number of milestones and hurdles in the fight against HIV/AIDS, Davis said.

In 1979, the first medical journals reported a new mysterious disease, but it was not until 1982 that the Wall Street Journal reported the disease officially as acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

Volunteers began to educate and teach in high-risk communities in 1983.

Davis said 1985 was a productive year in the fight against the disease. The death of Rock Hudson that year brought AIDS to society's mainstream.

"It takes celebrity status to bring things to the forefront, and this did," Davis said.

The mainstream theatrical presentation, "Long Time Companion," brought a great deal of media attention to HIV/AIDS, as did Ryan White, a young boy who contracted the disease through a blood transfusion.

Davis said another celebrity brought media focus to the disease in 1991. Magic Johnson, an American hero, announced he was infected with HIV.

"I cannot tell you the number of people that got tested that month," Davis said. "Suddenly anybody that watched basketball thought they were infected with AIDS."

By 1991, more than 400,000 people had died of AIDS.

"Does anybody know how many people died in World War II, Vietnam and the Gulf War?" Davis asked the audience. "Put them all together."

In 1997, 6 million people were infected with HIV. Millions of children were orphaned by parents who died of AIDS, and 590,000 children were infected by their mothers.

"I deal with numbers everyday," Davis said. "I try hard not to think of just who died. It is not just the person infected, it is the people affected."

Dana Rose, peer educator with STD, HIV/AIDS Peer Educators (SHAPE), agreed with Davis and said it is time for a movement of change.

"If it doesn't affect you, it affects someone you know," she said. Davis said ending the epidemic begins with each person.

"All you need to do is be a force for change within yourself," he said.

Davis was brought to K-State for AIDS Awareness Week, sponsored by Lafene Health Center, the Communicable Disease Committee and SHAPE.

Chad Vawter, a peer educator with SHAPE, said he appreciated the relevance of Davis' speech to the work Vawter does.

"He covers a lot of the same things we do in our presentation. I thought that was good," Vawter said.

Davis encouraged students to become involved with groups like SHAPE and become peer educators.

"Peer education is one of the best methods of behavioral change," Davis said.

House looks into alleged fund-raising violations

By LARRY MARGASAK
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — House impeachment investigators armed with a court order reviewed secret memos on alleged fund-raising abuses in President Clinton's 1996 campaign Wednesday, while the president's lawyers demanded the sensitive materials to wage a vigorous defense.

The investigators reviewed memos by prosecutor Charles LaBella and FBI Director Louis Freeh at the Justice Department after U.S. District Judge Norma Holloway Johnson — acting on the department's motion — authorized the inspection.

Republicans, who won a victory by gaining the inspection, said the documents potentially could upset the House Judiciary Committee's tight impeachment schedule. However, the senior Democrat on the committee, Rep. John Conyers of Michigan, said his counsel thoroughly examined the memo and "advised me that nothing in these documents is in any way relevant to ... consideration of possible impeachable offenses ..."

Committee Republicans had no comment on the review.

The White House legal team accepted an invitation from the committee to make a defense before the inquiry next Tuesday and possibly even call witnesses, but it demanded access to the fund-raising memos and additional investigative material related to Monica Lewinsky and Kathleen Willey.

Willey, a former White House aide, contends that Clinton made an unwanted sexual advance, and the committee is trying to determine whether anyone tried to intimidate her from testifying about the alleged incident. Clinton denies making the advance.

"We will, of course, accept your invitation to appear before the committee and to present a defense on behalf of the president," White House lawyers Gregory B. Craig and Charles F.C. Ruff wrote to committee Chairman Henry Hyde, R-Ill.

"Once we have reviewed the materi-

Range should be safe despite funding woes

Poor maintenance practices on the Department of Military Science's firing range are putting K-State students at risk every day.

Even when a student voiced concerns about ricocheting bullets, he was told to sit at the back of the room and dodge them.

Simply put, the Tyler E. Houdek Memorial Range in the basement of Military Science Hall is an unsafe place. It's unsafe because bullets ricochet from a concrete-block wall. It's unsafe because lead traps are rarely cleaned. It's unsafe because the attitude seems to be "every man for himself."

Shards of bullets ricochet off the concrete wall that a 1992 Fort Riley inspection concluded should be wood.

Guidelines for range maintenance simply aren't being followed.

Ventilation pulling lead particles out of the range is poor. Lead traps overflow, increasing the risk of exposure to lead particles in the air. The Standard Operating Procedure document says traps should be cleaned daily.

But Sergeant Ezra Jackson, instructor for Basic Riflery, said generally they are cleaned once every three months.

Once every three months. That means by the time they actually are cleaned, they should have been cleaned almost 90 times.

This increases the lead in the air, giving the lead particles more opportunity to land in the hair, on the skin and on the clothes of students on the range. Students take these lead particles home, sharing them with roommates, friends and maybe even children.

It isn't easy to follow these guidelines because of a lack of funding and department resources. Improving ventilation takes money. Cleaning lead traps takes manpower. We understand the range is an older facility, but it should be run a little tighter.

This is a firing range, folks. We're not talking about a classroom in Eisenhower Hall with squeaky desks.

Why not use money from the crumbling classroom fund to improve conditions on the range? Reducing the risk of lead poisoning or injury from ricocheting bullets seems a little more important than fixing a few wobbly desks.

Yes, students are briefed on safety procedures at the beginning of the semester, and they are required to wear safety glasses and ear protection. They are told to wash their hands and face thoroughly to remove lead particles.

But they only are told this once—when the semester begins. Granted, students are adults and need to take care of themselves, but a little reminder every once in a while couldn't hurt.

Some students might scoff at the risk since it is not a priority of the instructors. It should be.

Basic riflery is a popular class at K-State. Many students who have no previous experience with firing weapons enroll in the class. We are lucky to have this opportunity.

Students have been hit with ricochets twice in the last three weeks. While neither of these resulted in any serious harm, it seems the possibility is there. What happens if someone does get seriously injured? The range closes.

The range closes because the military science department and the university didn't see a need to make fundamental, safety-minded improvements.

Athletic department should anticipate destructive fans

Editor,

The current issue with the goal posts seems silly to me. The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics is condemning the destruction of its specially built, indestructible goal post, and now it wants Thomas Sign Advertising Inc., the company that built it, to pay for its repair. The fans feel justified in its destruction because their team broke a 30-year drought against a very good football team. No one is completely happy.

Well, I have a solution. Instead of a massive, expensive goal post, the athletic department should have put up the cheapest, flimsiest goal post it could find. There is no denying 10,000 yelling, screaming college students, no matter how strong your goal post is, nor should they be denied. Next time, make mine fiberglass.

The answer is waiting behind a closed door

VIEWPOINT

Ken Wells

I've made the acquaintance of a lot of interesting people since the semester began. One of these happens to be a female graduate teaching assistant who made it plain that she did not like having the door held open for her. I made a note of this; after all, I don't like making people uncomfortable (unless, of course, they're driving and talking on a cellular phone, in which case I'll just nudge them into another lane, out of my way).

But some habits are just too hard to break.

Since then, I think I've managed to squelch that memory and hold the door for her at every available opportunity. It's almost like I'm trying to offend her. I'm not (yet), it's just habit, and sometimes, I can't understand her discomfort.

Somewhere, deep beneath the psychological embitterment toward Jennifer Love Hewitt and Barney the dinosaur in my psychological circuitry lies this notion of social deference toward women, of placing female needs before male needs. Let's call this attitude, for lack of a better word, chivalry.

I know, I know, the word doesn't have the same connotations since feudal days of yore. Even in its present, watered-down form, it's become somewhat rusted with antiquity, but even this medieval fossil still has its hooks in today's society to some degree.

I'm not talking offering to slay dragons or putting coats over water puddles; those days are long dead and buried. Holding doors and standing before the female sits at the table are about the extent of yesteryear's pull on our information-driven fin-de-siècle culture.

The problem is that our culture is making a transition to emphasizing equality over chivalry. Some, like my aforementioned cohort, would rather get the door themselves. However, others feel complimented after being treated in such a manner, or worse, would think slightly less of a male who did not offer to hold a door. I can respect either way. It seems to be a question not of liberal vs. conservative as much as a question of nostalgia or romanticism.

Problem is, even those people I think I've known for quite some time continue to impress and surprise me with where they fall on the door issue. Some of them appreciate the gesture. Others would prefer to get the damn door themselves, thank you very much.

I'll make you a deal. I'll respect your stand on the issue if you just forgive the fact that I will inevitably, unconsciously move for the door first. I don't know why. I tried to listen to KISS songs during my formative years — are there subliminal messages on "Detroit Rock City" of Ace Frehley whispering, "hold the door open for her, man"? Either way, it's hard-wired into my brain, and I don't want to be condescending or patronizing to people I respect, but it happens sometimes anyway. Just as I can't watch "Party of Five" or that discolored reptile without convulsing, I just have to open that door.

There is no disrespect intended, and if I squint and tilt my head right, I can see where that might be seen. I can see where you might think that I want to show superiority (snort) or dominant strength (chuckle) by clearing the path for the lesser, frailier (chortle) female. I've held the door open for Bonnie, and Bonnie could pick me up and stuff me into the nearest wastepaper basket without blinking. She could tear me to ribbons or fold, spindle and mutilate me with all the effort that it takes to open the newspaper. She has my respect; I am in no way her superior (well, I own more hockey jerseys), but I will hold the door open for her.

Maybe you're more evolved than cultural throwbacks like me. If so, tolerate our foibles. You're sufficiently ascended to do so. We mean you no harm, no slight. Some of us are preprogrammed. Some of us are just erring on the side of safety and respect. We are no threat to your integrity or your independence. If anything, we're just makin' a path.

Physician-assisted suicide brings death, not mercy

VIEWPOINT

Sam Sackett

Allowing physicians to alleviate pain by alleviating life is a damned notion. This kind of attitude is detrimental to life itself and is contrary to the American spirit.

Jack Kevorkian recently killed another terminally-ill patient. This makes at least 130 assisted suicides since 1990. His most recent assistance turned into a homicide. If he is allowed to continue, eventually other people could decide when a person's life can be ended legally.

Traditionally, the role of a doctor has been to help heal. Because of this, I do not refer to Kevorkian as a doctor.

Throughout history, we have placed a price on life. This country has long placed that price high. Despite the tremendous cost, we have decided that certain things are worth the price of a few, and in some cases many, individual lives, but only if the reward outweighs the individual losses.

We have decided that the benefits of liberty are worth the expense. That is ultimately why our troops are willing to sacrifice their lives.

When an innocent civilian life is taken, we try to find ways to prevent it from happening again. We try to learn from history so we do not continue making the same errors.

This generation is faced with deciding what attitude it will adopt concerning the price of life. Do we lessen the pain by finding cures for illnesses, or do we make suicide a legal option?

As soon as we allow suicide to become readily available to the terminally ill, what compels us to withhold the same treatment from the physically handicapped who do not want to burden their families? The mentally ill who no longer are producing anything for society? The elderly who do not seem to enjoy life anymore? The list could keep growing.

And it will grow to reality unless the issue becomes securely settled in the hearts of all Americans. The cost of legally allowing physicians to assist in the taking of life is not worth the price we will pay as a whole. Even if the pain of the terminally ill ceases with assisted suicide, is the loss of life itself not a greater hurt?

We have long been a people who dream big dreams and somehow find a way to reach those dreams. We have long been a people who believe in reaching for big answers to our big questions. When the struggle to keep life becomes more difficult, we have found a way to fight harder, strive with more endurance and strain more courageously. We are a people who use our trials as motivation. We do not give up — and for good reasons.

This century, we have witnessed a society that began terminating life as a means to relieve pain. This attitude has led to physicians bringing death instead of life, and it is the same attitude that is now on trial in America.

The disposition that wants to terminate life mercifully is precisely the attitude of doctors and scientists who helped carry out euthanasia atrocities during the Holocaust.

Leo Alexander, a medical expert at the Nuremberg medical trials, had this to say about the monstrosities:

"Whatever proportions these crimes finally assumed, it became evident to all who investigated them that they had started from small beginnings. The beginnings at first were merely a subtle shift in emphasis in the basic attitude of the physicians. It started with the acceptance of the attitude, basic in the euthanasia movement, that there is such a thing as a life not worthy to be lived."

Nothing in the American spirit gives us cause to give up and take the easy way out. Life is immensely valuable. We must not resort to the destroying of life and call it mercy. Instead, we must believe unshakably that our God-given lives are worth living, and that life is worth each struggle and hardship.

K-State logs on to online book service

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

The beginning of a new semester means money is spent on tuition and books. With a new online source, textbooks can be purchased for less than bookstore prices.

K-State was just added to the book list for VarsityBooks.com, an online retailer that allows students to purchase textbooks with course information such as the professor's name, the course listing or the book's ISBN number.

Whitney Gould, spokesperson for VarsityBooks.com, said all the books a student would need are online, and students can save up to 40 percent by searching through the 400,000 book titles available.

Jodi Gershoni, communications director for VarsityBooks.com, said online book purchasing is more convenient for students.

"By purchasing textbooks online, students avoid the long lines, and it is made easier for the students," Gershoni said.

Gershoni said the 40-percent discount is available because the site cuts out a middleman; books are shipped directly from the distributor to the student's home within two to three business days. A flat shipping rate of $4.95 is charged no matter how many books are ordered.

"The hard part is letting people know about the service," Gershoni said. "College is expensive. Students can try us out, trust us, and I guarantee you they will be back each semester."

VarsityBooks.com was incorporated in December 1997. However, its first semester of sales was fall 1998. Next semester, more than 50 schools will have their course books on the search engine, including Texas A&M University, the University of Kansas and the University of Nebraska.

Carrie Mitchell, book division manager of the K-State Student Union Bookstore, said the store has compared its prices with VarsityBooks.com.

Although most of the books found on the site were cheaper than at the Union Bookstore, Mitchell said discounts were not higher than 20 percent, and most were in the teens.

Judy Lundberg, bookstore textbook manager, said buying textbooks from the Union rather than online has two advantages.

One is the return policy. The Union Bookstore has a three-week return policy; VarsityBooks.com only has a 14-day return policy. The Union Bookstore also gives a 25-percent discount on used textbooks.

The second advantage is convenience. The Union is on campus, and all of the money from textbooks eventually goes right back into the Union and the students, Lundberg said.

"The money won't stay in Manhattan but goes to Washington, D.C. Students should buy their textbooks here because the money goes back to them," she said.

Bookstore manager Kay Farley said students should shop around and compare prices.

"Consumers today are more savvy, and they know much more than the consumer two years ago," Farley said. "Most consumers do a lot of comparison shopping, and I hope they continue to check things out

SGA adopts 2 families for winter holidays

Students challenge university administration to match community service efforts

By SHANDA PARKER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Student Governing Association is taking an active role during the holidays. The Student Affairs/Social Services Committee has decided to get involved with area community service.

"This is something new. We haven't done anything like this in the past," said Sarah Morris, senior in civil engineering. "Community service is a continuous project."

The committee set a goal to develop several projects for the upcoming year, including a couple of projects for the holidays and a larger, campus-wide community service project in the spring.

SGA decided to adopt two families and challenge K-State's administration to do the same. Both groups are working with the Flint Hills Breadbasket in the selection of the families.

Robin Cates, senior in family life and community services, said a donation bucket is located in the SGA office in the K-State Student Union, and the bucket also is passed around at committee meetings for Adopt-a-Family donations.

"We are encouraging each SGA member to give $5," Cates said. "We are hoping for $500. Right now we have between $285 to $300."

SGA also is working with the Salvation Army through the holiday months. Morris said they will be setting up cardboard trees in the residence halls and in the Union for students to donate new or used mittens, scarfs and hats.

"We talked to the Salvation Army, and they said those things are in great demand," Morris said.

Cates said there has been so much support for the community service projects, the committee wanted to do a larger project in the spring. The committee is planning a campus-wide community service day.

"It will be a huge day in the spring for community service," Morris said. "It is right now in the beginning stages of planning."

Cates said the committee is working with Texas A&M to discuss ideas because the school has done similar projects.

The committee is planning to set a day aside for campus and Manhattan organizations to work together.

"It's a new way for people to get involved and interact with one another," Morris said.

■ Texas A&M stymied by Cats in 36-17 loss last season.

By JOHN BERGGREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

You can bet there's been one thing going through the minds of every Texas A&M offensive player this week in preparation for its Big 12 Championship game with K-State on Saturday.

Quarterback Randy McCown and running back Dante Hall surely have not forgotten the brick wall they found themselves up against when they faced the Wildcats last season on the unfriendly confines of Wagner Field.

The Aggies were held to minus 35 yards rushing and 125 yards passing on that day in a 36-17 defeat.

For K-State, on the other hand, that day brings back nothing but great memories. It was undoubtedly one of the best showings the defense has ever had.

"We did a great job, and our defense played one of its better games probably ever," said linebacker Mark Simoneau, who led the way with 13 tackles in that game. "It would be nice to repeat a performance like that, but chances are that's not going to happen. We've just got to go out and play solid for four quarters."

This year's matchup in St. Louis doesn't shape up to resemble anything similar to what took place last year. K-State has slipped defensively of late, giving up significant yards to Nebraska and Missouri in the past two games. Also, a more-balanced Aggie passing attack poses at least some concerns for the Cats.

However, K-State coach Bill Snyder said at least some credit for the big yardage surrendered had to be given to the opposing offenses for making good plays.

"Corby Jones put the ball in some spots that most guys can't get it in, and their receivers made some tremendous plays," Snyder said. "We had some receivers covered as well as you could cover them, and they still went up and made some great plays."

"It wasn't always that we were playing poorly with our coverage or with our cornerbacks. I think by and large, Missouri just did a tremendous job of catching some balls."

On the positive side, however, Gerald Neasman will be back at cornerback for the Wildcats after missing the last five games. Neasman brings more size to the position, which has been exploited in past weeks.

"I think that will definitely help us on defense," Simoneau said. "He's a great cornerback and really helps us on the back end."

"We've just got to get some pressure on the quarterback, and hopefully he'll throw up some bad balls and we'll get the picks."

Defensive tackle Andrae Rowe also could be back for the Texas A&M game after missing his first start of the season against Missouri because of a sprained ankle he suffered against Nebraska.

Safety Jarrod Cooper offered the possibility that fatigue could be a reason why K-State gave up big plays on defense against Nebraska and Missouri. After not having a game during Thanksgiving break, the sophomore said the Wildcats have returned refreshed.

"I think we have a little advantage because we've had last week off, and I know I slept for three days," Cooper said.

"So, I'm good, and I can run around for a few miles and I'll be all right. I think the whole team feels a lot less tired after taking that break."

Tickets available

Approximately 10,000 tickets are available for Saturday's Big 12 Football Championship at the Trans World Dome in St. Louis. Fans can purchase tickets by calling Daltix at (314) 989-8000 or (800) 771-3666. Phone lines are open 24 hours.

In Manhattan, Topeka and metropolitan Kansas City, tickets can be purchased at Ticket Central outlets, including Streetside Records, 1231 Moro St. in Agaveville. Tickets cost $60, $40, $30 and $20. Service charges range from $3 to $4.25 a ticket.

Fans requiring hotel information can call the Big 12 Housing Bureau at (800) 916-0096 between 8 a.m. and 5 p.m. today and Friday. More than 30 St. Louis-area hotels have been designated as "Official Big 12 Fan Hotels."

Although the K-State football team only can hope that taking care of business Saturday against Texas A&M will earn a trip to the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl and a chance to play for the national title, Wildcat fans can do their part by voting in a Fiesta Bowl Top 25 fan poll. Just go to www.fiesta-bowl.com/top25/fan\_poll.html. The poll holds no bearing over the teams selected, but it provides another opportunity for Cat fans to display their loyalty.

COACH 'SWARTZ'

Former K-State point guard finishing degree, spending time on sidelines for Asbury, Cats

After spending four years leading K-State's 3-point attack, one of the scrappiest players for the Cats is turning over a new leaf in the world of college basketball.

Instead of inspiring his teammates on the court, this year Swartzendruber will help the K-State men's basketball team on the bench.

Swartzendruber, a fifth-year senior in accounting, is not only a graduate assistant coach for the Cats this year season, but his duties also include helping out with the team's film exchange program.

"I keep contact with other schools to organize, receive and send out films," he said. "I also go to every practice to help the guys and give them some pointers."

Since Swartzendruber's eligibility ran out a year ago, he is finishing his degree this year while maintaining an active role on the team.

"I really enjoy the game," he said. "I love the X's and O's of the game. It has been part of my life for so long. I have always wanted to be around it."

Swartzendruber said the transition from player to coach has been smooth so far.

"There is always an adjustment period, but it's gone pretty well," he said.

"I am getting a lot out of it, and I think the team is too."

A Kalona, Iowa, native and son of a high school basketball coach, Swartzendruber said coaching brings a whole new aspect to the game.

"It's the same game, but a different side of it," he said.

"You get the whole picture of the game. A player's responsibility is to put forth his best effort. It's the same thing with a coach, but there are different aspects."

Swartzendruber, who averaged 9 points and earned First Team Academic All-Big 12 honors a year ago, said it's exciting to coach players he played with.

"I really don't tell them what to do," he said. "I just offer suggestions and try to help them through the rough times."

"I think the players recognize that I was someone who has been there," he said.

"I've been through the same things they have been through, and at this level, you just try to get every advantage you can get."

As for which is more challenging, playing or coaching basketball, he said it's too early to tell.

Swartzendruber, who played for four years, is serving as a graduate assistant coach for the team. Swartzendruber is a fifth-year senior in accounting whose duties include helping out with the team's film exchange program.

"It's a challenge on both sides," he said. "It's a challenge trying to get players motivated as a teammate and as a coach."

During his career at K-State, Swartzendruber netted 107 3-pointers, good for fourth in K-State's record book, and played on the Cats' 1995-96 NCAA Tournament squad.

After a two-year hiatus from the tournament, Swartzendruber said he aspires for the Cats to receive a bid and simply to improve.

"I think they have a lot of potential," he said. "I just want to make sure they make the most out of their opportunities here. If they work hard, success will come."

Considering that Swartzendruber's playing career is over, he said he has no regrets in ending his K-State eligibility.

"I don't regret anything," he said. "All I wanted to accomplish was to put forth 100 percent and work as hard as I could. I feel that I did that."

As for the future, he said he just wants to stay involved with the game he loves.

"Right now, I'm enjoying what I'm doing," he said.

"I just want to stay with basketball and maybe help younger kids with their game."

Thanksgiving weekend provides many things to be thankful for, BCS might be 1 of them

VIEWPOINT

Mike VIETTI

I must admit it. I love holidays. I love every single one. From Arbor Day to President's Day, any holiday is a great day for me. However, like most parents with multiple children, I do have a favorite.

Indeed, Thanksgiving is my holiday of choice. I can remember way back in elementary school when my teachers explained that Thanksgiving is a time to ... well ... be thankful for everything with which the good Lord has blessed us; I can't imagine where the name Thanksgiving came from. Keeping that philosophy in mind, I offer the following things the ghosts of Pilgrims and American Indians reminded me of this year:

How could I begin with anything else but the fantastically designed Bowl Championship Series? Entering the season, this was the addition to Division I college football that was supposed to make fans forget about the injustice of not having a playoff system to determine the national champion.

Well, it looks like the NCAA brain trust's solution is faring well, except for the fact that there is a high probability three high-quality teams will be undefeated after the regular season (sorry, Tulane), thus dealing a significant blow to the hopes that there will be only one national champion this year.

It looks like the NCAA can't do anything right.

Last year, the bowl alliance system was supposed to provide only one national champion, but Nebraska and Tom Osborne foiled that attempt; then comes this year with the BCS disaster. Maybe the NCAA will screw up again and implement a playoff system. If anyone or anything in the world could mess up a playoff system, the NCAA could.

Gosh, I sure am thankful for the BCS. Moving on to the professional ranks, I am thankful for the wonderful NFL officiating crews who blew too many calls in the past week.

Let's begin with the Thanksgiving Day game between the Pittsburgh Steelers and the Detroit Lions. Now, I've been known to mistake some words for other words at times, but I'm sure that even in my late 90s (should I live so long), when I have four hearing aids, I never would mistake the word heads for tails, or vice versa.

Too bad we can't say the same for all NFL officials. At the beginning of overtime, the head referee did the impossible: confused those two words, resulting in the Lions receiving the ball when the Steelers should have, and, of course, a Lions victory.

Now, we'll move on to the Sunday contest between the New England Patriots and the Buffalo Bills. With less than a minute left in the game and the Patriots trailing by 4 points — and on a fourth-and-9, to make matters worse — officials declared a Drew Bledsoe pass to Shawn Jefferson complete for a first down, when replays showed Jefferson probably didn't get one foot in, let alone two. The result: The Patriots go on to win the game, thanks to the refs.

Thankfulness in bunches goes out to those NFL officials.

From a serious perspective, let's talk about the beloved Kansas City Chiefs. Actually, I don't like the Chiefs at all. Anyone else out there who doesn't live and die for the Chiefs (if there is such a person) knows precisely what I am speaking of. It sure is spectacular to see the Chiefs, whom many predicted would finish the regular season undefeated, dogpaddling in the wake of the Denver Broncos.

Remember at the start of the season when Derrick "Oops, is that your face mask?" Thomas subtly hinted that his team could step alongside the 1972 Miami Dolphins as the only teams to finish a NFL season without a loss?

Nostradamus, Derrick ain't.

Perhaps Thomas meant to say the 1995 Dolphins, who, like the Chiefs of this year, loaded up on high-priced talent in hopes of making a push toward the Super Bowl, only to finish 9-7. Wait, he couldn't have been referring to that team, either, because the Chiefs won't even make it to 8-8, let alone the playoffs.

I thoroughly enjoy witnessing, on the whole, the most pretentious fans in all of sports ("We're the best fans in the NFL, even though we wouldn't have been caught dead in Arrowhead when we sucked in the '80s") eat their words and suffer through a most disappointing season.

Dear Lord, I truly am thankful for the Kansas City Chiefs.

Gee whiz, there's so much to appreciate in this fantastic world in which we live.

I can only count the days until the ghosts of the Mayflower enlighten me next year.

Show to incorporate unique choreography

By JAIMIE HARTTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

Polkas, waltzes, tangos, jitterbugging, the cha-cha, jazz and ballet are some of the dance genres that will be represented at this year's WinterDance '98, which opens at 8 tonight in Nichols Theatre.

Other evening performances also are at 8 p.m. Friday and Saturday, and an afternoon performance is scheduled for 2 p.m. Saturday.

This year, the Department of Speech Communication, Theatre and Dance is incorporating ballroom dancing with jazz and ballet, which is a new look for the WinterDance. Jo Miller, instructor of speech communication, theater and dance, said although it is unusual to have these dance styles together, it will be an exciting change.

"It's not common to have ballroom dance and evening dance together, but I think people are really going to enjoy it," Miller said.

Works choreographed by Michael Bennett, guest artist for the department, will be featured in the program. These will include polka, waltz, tango, jitterbug and cha-cha dances.

Miller said the dance department did not necessarily plan for ballroom dancing to be on the venue, but because Bennett was a guest artist for the fall semester, it worked out that way.

Miller will be presenting a jazz piece entitled "Played." Pomeroy, who won the 1998 OPUS band contest, will perform live music to her dance. Miller said she was one of the judges for the OPUS competition, and after Pomeroy's performance there, she asked the band if it would perform with her.

"We've never had live music of that genre or amplified guitars," Miller said. "Pomeroy is very professional, and I'm excited to work with them. It's challenging, but always rewarding."

Joyce Yagerline, assistant professor of speech communication, theatre and dance, will be performing "Les Sirenes," which she choreographed. It is a classic ballet piece, which evokes swirling and waterlike images.

Four students also will be presenting pieces they choreographed. Melissa Holthaus, senior in theater, will be presenting "Harvest" with violin accompaniment; Janusz Jaworski, senior in speech education, will perform "The Nearest Recedes;" Tiffany Lee, sophomore in theater, will perform "..." with music by Janet Jackson; and Diana Yamabayashi, senior in theater, will perform "Prey" with music by Bjork.

Miller said since the performance is being staged in Nichols Theatre, the setting will add to the audience's enjoyment.

"It's wonderful, especially in Nichols, because it is so intimate and you can see all the details," Miller said.

SHOW INFO:
Winterdance '98 performances will be at 8 p.m. on December 3, 4, and 5 with a 2 p.m. show on December 5. The performances will be in Nichols Theatre, and tickets are available at McCain Box Office. The tickets are $6 for students and senior citizens and $9 for the general public.

Students bring new style, music to production

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

Nichols Hall's new dance studios have been getting a lot of mileage the past few weeks as the Department of Speech Communication, Theatre and Dance prepares for WinterDance '98.

WinterDance, a K-State staple for many years, is an event designed to raise money for departmental needs such as guest artists and field trips. The choreographers and dancers for this year's show have been practicing since the second week of class to perfect their performances.

Since the department has been choreographing WinterDance for so long, audiences might begin to suspect the same moves are recycled year after year. However, K-State's dance program works hard to explore fresh ideas each season.

"Every choreographer does what they're inspired to do at that time," Jo Miller, dance instructor, said.

Although traditional forms of dance, such as ballet, are used in Winterdance each year, Miller, the department's jazz instructor, focused on choreographing more modern styles of dance. Miller will be trying a few new ideas with this performance, including a hip-hop number featuring Pomeroy, the 1998 OPUS Competition winner.

"I knew I wanted to do a hip-hop number this year, and when I saw Pomeroy at the OPUS competition, I asked them to perform for us," Miller said.

Another Miller addition to the presentation will be an experimental dance and theater piece titled "Attachments," which began as a class assignment for Miller's dance theater lab.

"We were asked to write down our reactions to something in class, and that turned into part of the text of

"Attachments," Sarah Toberlin, freshman in dance, said.

After the text of the act was developed, the dancers began to improvise movements that could be used in the performance.

"Jo videotaped the movements we improvised, and after watching the tapes, she kept the movements she liked," said Renee Williams, freshman in dance and sociology.

Michael Bennett, a ballroom dance instructor from Manhattan, was invited to be the guest choreographer for WinterDance '98. Bennett has designed four ballroom numbers for this year's performance: a waltz, a tango, a cha-cha, and a swing dance. Although many K-State students will be featured in Bennett's acts, he also will be providing guest dancers from his ballroom classes.

One benefit of having a guest choreographer from Manhattan is the extra time it gives performers to learn the dances.

"Usually, the guest artist has about one or two weeks of intense instruction before a performance, and then they leave town," said Janusz Jaworski, senior in speech education. "Since the instruction was spread out, it had a different feel to it."

Jaworski, one of four student choreographers of WinterDance '98, will dance a sequence he originally designed for another student. When the first dancer felt uncomfortable with the act and dropped out, Jaworski decided to perform it himself.

"I just built the dance, without worrying about the feeling or meaning of it," Jaworski said. "I looked at what worked and looked to see where I could take it."

After he developed the dance, Jaworski searched for the right music to accompany it. A poem by Emily Dickinson helped put the entire performance together, he said.

New album features Oasis' lesser-known releases

By JEFF ELLIOTT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

Cocky? Brash? Arrogant? Oasis has been accused of being all three, but based on its previous albums, no one should accuse the band of writing bad songs.

The Gallagher brothers & Co. have compiled an album containing some of Oasis' lesser-known songs this side of the Atlantic Ocean to follow up three smash successes.

The album is chock full of B-sides and rarities that are sure to delight fans and to please even Oasis' staunchest critics.

"The Masterplan" opens heroically with "Acquiesce," a highly charged power track that cleverly laces samples of Oasis' own "Morning Glory." When fans were asked to vote for songs to be included on the album, "Acquiesce" understandably won hands down.

The album's 14 tracks are not all as energetic as its opener, but each song still is good in its own way.

The album ranges beautifully from live cuts, such as a cover of the Lennon/McCartney classic "I Am the Walrus," a song even the Beatles never performed live, to bittersweet acoustic melodies such as "Half the World Away."

"Headshrinker," one of the earliest Oasis songs written, dating to 1992, reflects the band during its more punk-influenced phase. Another Oasis oldie is the fourth track, "Going Nowhere," which was written before the band was signed in 1990. Its soft brass accompaniment and hard-edged lyrics make this song a perfect example of the variety found in "The Masterplan."

Although the album might comprise B-sides, its material is not second-rate. One track in particular, "Talk Tonight," was a No. 1 smash in the United Kingdom. Other songs on the album have climbed the British rock charts as well.

Another great song on the album is the title track. In fact, Noel Gallagher rates "The Masterplan" as one of his finest works to date, which is a big statement, considering the guitarist and vocalist already has penned Oasis' signature tune, "Wonderwall."

Even though "The Masterplan" won't be up for any Grammy Awards, the album is still a great listen and is an excellent addition to any music lover's collection.

Although Oasis hasn't reached the critical acclaim given to its idols, The Beatles, the Manchester band continues to etch its music into rock history.

Take a break from the hustle and bustle of the holiday season and spend an afternoon in 1880s London, as the Nebraska Theatre Caravan brings Charles Dickens' classic, A Christmas Carol, to life.

The Caravan's version, now in its 20th year, promises a delightful afternoon where audiences of all ages will enjoy a holiday story in a production that features elegant costumes and lavish sets. As one critic wrote, "...the performance, along with rich and colorful scenery and period costuming, all combined to create a Christmas flavor one could almost taste just by watching...and what a superior taste it was."

Don't miss the holiday treat that will captivate your whole family!

Curators' executive committee Tuesday asked system President Manuel Pacheco to analyze the issue and make a recommendation next month.

The move upset some students, professors and staff members, who pledged to continue petitioning the curators and Pacheco for a change in system policy.

"I'm very disappointed," said Michael Mobley, an assistant professor of educational and counseling psychology at the Columbia, Mo., campus.

"It's a decision in which they can sort of wash their hands of the matter and not respond to the citizens of the state of Missouri and the university community at large."

Two of the system's four campuses — Columbia and St. Louis — had stated they did not discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation.

The University of Missouri system office voided those policies because they were not a systemwide stance. University brochures and job advertisements say the university does not discriminate by race, age, veteran status and several other categories.

In an emotional testimony at a public hearing Nov. 13, and in letters and e-mail messages, professors, staff members and students told the executive committee that crimes on campus would stem from the change. They also said it would send a clear message that gay persons were not valued in the University of Missouri system.

Emporia State President Kay Schallenkamp revoked the protection in July upon the advice of university attorneys. Gay, lesbian and bisexual supporters, who heard of the change only recently, are planning a forum in January.

"I'm hoping we will be there in full force and will let the administrators know that this action is reprehensible and that we demand it (the words) be reinstated," said Christine Robinson, a KU graduate instructor who is helping organize the forum at Emporia State.

Schallenkamp said Tuesday she was sorry her decision had caused distress. "This institution has a long history of tolerance and civility and treating people the way they should be treated, and it will continue to do so," she said.

Schallenkamp, who became president in August 1997, said Joseph Barron, an attorney for the Kansas Board of Regents and Emporia State's general counsel, advised her to delete sexual orientation because Emporia State is a state agency. Because the state doesn't consider sexual orientation a protected class, it doesn't seem appropriate for the university to do so, Barron said.

Emporia State's policy now says it "does not discriminate on grounds of race, color, gender, national origin or ancestry, age, disability, Vietnam Era veteran (status) or other factors prohibited by law."

Schallenkamp said a group was developing a university value statement that addressed how people should be treated. She said she hoped it was in place by the end of January.

accepting invitations to speak. No dates or names were given.

Before choosing speakers, Reagan consults with Wefald and Nancy Landon Kassebaum Baker, former U.S. Senator and daughter of Kansas politician Alf Landon, for whom the series is named.

The committee looks for powerful people who influence U.S. and international governments as well as prominent journalists and, occasionally, leading economists, Reagan said.

"We go after the very top people," he said.

Reagan said if the committee had lowered its standards, it could have had three Landon Lectures this fall.

"But we refuse to lower our standards just to have a speaker," he said.

The series has brought 112 speakers to K-State since its beginning in 1966. Ideally, Reagan said, there would be two Landon Lectures in the fall and two in the spring.

CLINTON

al, we will be prepared to present a vigorous defense of the president," the letter said, asking to receive the documents at least 48 hours before the defense presentation.

Paul McNulty, spokesman for committee Republicans, said the GOP was "certainly willing to notify the White House prior to its presentation next week of the issues it may wish to defend, although the president knows the truth better than anyone."

A Clinton administration official, speaking only on condition of anonymity, expressed doubt that the committee would provide all the material but said the defense would go on, regardless.

In fact, under Johnson's order, the committee staffers were not permitted to copy the Freeh and LaBella memos or even take notes.

The committee announced a schedule that includes the White House presentation and summaries by the Democratic and Republican chief investigators, all next Tuesday and Wednesday. The committee then will begin deliberations on articles of impeachment Thursday and continue Friday and possibly Saturday.

"Meanwhile, the committee will continue with its expeditious investigation of other matters relevant to the inquiry, including the taking of depositions," the committee said in a statement.

LaBella said in an interview Wednesday that he would testify in a closed-door committee deposition Friday. However, the prosecutor, who concluded that an independent counsel should investigate the Clinton fund raising, added that he is prohibited from discussing the memo's grand jury material.

RANGE

followed or enforced regularly by range staff. For example, students are given a safety briefing at the beginning of the semester that encourages them to wash their arms and hands and wipe off their shoes after using the range to get lead particles off their skin. This is rarely, if ever, done.

Instead of monthly, as the SOP states, the range is vacuumed every three months with a HEPA vacuum. Vertical surfaces are cleaned at most once a year, if at all. The classroom floor is, however, swept and mopped three times a week by cadets.

"The students are adults, and they are given a safety briefing," Wallace said. "We're not going to put a man at the door to check shoes."

Low ventilation a problem

Ventilation has been a problem in the facility for nearly 10 years. According to Department of Public Safety records, the range has failed to conform to Department of Army guidelines for air velocity at the firing line and elsewhere in the facility.

In 1989, there was an air velocity of 7 feet per minute at the firing line, compared to the Army recommended minimum of 75 fpm. The ventilation system has not changed since that time, although subsequent tests have recorded levels of between 50 and 75 fpm at the firing range. A test in 1996 determined that silica particles from the sand surrounding the target area also could pose a safety hazard, if inhaled. That sand was cleaned of lead particles more than a year ago.

"It would be nice if we could improve the air monitoring down there, but the costs are pretty high," Galitzer said.

In January 1998, it was determined to improve the ventilation would require $171,270. This would upgrade the system from a mere exhaust fan to a filtered-ventilation system that would keep air moving at recommended levels. In the last year, facilities has put nearly $12,000 into the range for cleaning sand, painting and installing emergency doors that close during fires.

The SOP document spells out what steps the range staff follows to keep lead-exposure levels low. Air monitoring, which is done on an annual basis in the firing range, has generally concluded the lead levels are too high according to Occupational Safety and Health Administration levels in past years. However, this has never been viewed as a problem since range staff is in the facility for at most 15 hours a week. The OSHA standard based on a level rated for 8 hours per day, five days per week.

According to OSHA, the buildup of lead in the body can harm the brain, nerves, red blood cells, reproductive systems and kidneys of both men and women. Symptoms include feeling tired, irritable and feeling aches and pains. Lead stays in the body for many years.

K-State is not required to follow OSHA standards, because the state of Kansas has not adopted OSHA standards but developed its own. Personnel from Fort Riley inspect the range once a year as a courtesy since the range does not fall under their supervision, even though the personnel are basically on loan from the Army to K-State. Fort Riley also tests Jackson for lead contaminants in his blood twice a year. So far, his blood-lead levels have not exceeded military standards.

As it stands now, an antiquated ventilation system exhausts the lead-filled air into the atmosphere outside the range. K-State is inspected occasionally for environmental hazards, and the last inspection, in 1997, determined the exhaust-to-air system at the range did not pose a threat to the external environment since the lead levels were so low.

Range drains resources

The military science department has opted to cancel the riflery course for next semester but not due to safety considerations.

Wallace said the department lacks two faculty positions it needs to operate efficiently, mainly because the Army cannot find the personnel to take the positions. He said by running the range, which uses two faculty members, the department can't offer other programs or give needed attention to existing ones. The range class will be offered again in the fall.

The safety considerations, however, seem to hinge on the lack of available funding.

It rests with the military science department, the College of Arts and Sciences and the Department of Facilities to raise the funds necessary to modernize the range. Facilities has informed the military science department that the facility modernization needed would be too expensive.

In a 1996 report by the Department of Public Safety, Galitzer concluded, "we are aware of the contamination, perhaps it is not a problem, if we use prudent practices in the use of the room. As long as the ventilation is adequate, and students as well as instructors follow prudent practices, the risk is very low."

Man accused in beating death of toddler held for trial

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

COUNCIL GROVE, Kan. — A man charged with fatally beating his girlfriend's 16-month-old son wiped away tears as an investigator read aloud his statement admitting responsibility for the death.

Scotty R. Adam, 24, is charged in Morris County District Court with felony murder and felony child abuse in the Oct. 22 death of Timothy Post.

"I look upon myself for the one to blame. I alone hurt Timmy enough for him to pass on," Adam said in a statement written Oct. 23 and read in court Wednesday by Special Agent Raymond Lundin of the Kansas Bureau of Investigation.

Based on testimony at Wednesday's preliminary hearing, Magistrate Judge Thomas H. Ball ruled there was enough evidence for Adam to stand trial.

This is the second time Adam will be tried in a homicide.

He was arrested in 1993 after he fatally stabbed a K-State freshman, Scott O. Sanders, 19.

A Morris County jury convicted him of second-degree murder and aggravated robbery.

The Kansas Supreme Court reversed his conviction due to legal technicalities and there was a new trial in Marion County, where a jury convicted him of a lesser charge of involuntary

Adam also arrested in '93 stabbing death of 19-year-old K-State freshman manslaughter.

Adam spent three years in prison and a year on parole after the Sanders killing. He had been off parole for about six months when Timothy was killed.

In court Wednesday, Timothy's mother, Jessica McAuley Post, testified the toddler had seemed sick for several days before Oct. 21, the day he stopped breathing and was taken to Wesley Medical Center in Wichita.

A doctor who treated Timothy at Morris County Hospital said he had bruises on his forehead and around his eyes.

In his statement to police and in interviews with KBI agents, Adam said he treated the toddler "rough" on several occasions, including Oct. 21. He was left alone that day to care for Timothy and his two older sisters, ages 2 and 3.

Lundin said Adam told him he threw Timothy into his crib "like a sack of potatoes," saying, "There you go, Timmy boy."

On Oct. 17, Post testified, Timothy twice fell down the stairs at the rental house she shared with Adam in Council Grove. The falls caused bruises on the boy's forehead, and he vomited, she said.

Two days later, Post said, her son fell off a couch and suffered what appeared to be a seizure.

Post said she and Adam didn't take Timothy to the hospital that day, but she scheduled a doctor's appointment for the following week.

Dr. Mary Boyce, who examined Timothy in Wichita, testified the falls couldn't have caused his death.

Timothy died as a result of massive brain trauma caused by Shaken Baby Syndrome, Boyce said.

In September, based on a report from Timothy's grandmother, the Kansas Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services found that Adam had spanked Timothy hard enough to leave bruises on his buttocks.

Authorities declined to place the boy in protective custody, and SRS drafted a safety plan under which Adam agreed not to hit the child to discipline him.

Adam remains in the Morris County Jail in lieu of a $250,000 bond. He is to be arraigned Jan. 19 in Marion County District Court.

PAINTING ST. LOUIS PURPLE

Before K-State fans in St. Louis watch the Wildcats match up against 10th-ranked Texas A&M on Saturday at the Trans World Dome, they can attend pregame parties and tailgating sponsored by the K-State Alumni Association and the St. Louis Convention and Visitors Commission.

K-State football fans welcome the football team onto Wagner Field this season when it matched up against Nebraska. K-State will play Texas A&M in the 1998 Dr Pepper Big 12 Football Championship Game at the Trans World Dome in St. Louis on Saturday. K-State's athletic ticket manager, Carol Adolph, said she expects K-State to use about 10,000 tickets; that figure includes students, alumni and other Wildcat fans. Estimations for Texas A&M ticket sales are around 4,500.

2,000 unsold tickets from Texas A&M allotment given to K-State ticket office

By TL MEYER

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If the Big 12 Conference championship game was to be decided by which school brought the most fans to St. Louis, K-State would win, hands down.

Of the 6,800 tickets allotted to Texas A&M for the 1998 Dr Pepper Big 12 Football Championship Game, 2,000 unsold tickets were sent to K-State on Nov. 24.

"There just wasn't a demand for them here," said Jim Kotch, athletic ticket manager for Texas A&M.

As of Wednesday, Kotch said 1,145 student and about 2,700 non-student tickets had been sold. He estimated they would sell 4,500 tickets before the game.

K-State's athletic ticket manager, Carol Adolph, said she expects K-State to use about 10,000 tickets; that figure includes students, alumni and other Wildcat fans.

Streetside Records, which is part of a Ticket Central Outlet, has seen strong sales as well.

Eileen Meyer, store director for Streetside Records, estimated it had sold about 5,500 tickets in person and by phone.

"We could have started selling tickets in mid-October but intentionally waited," she said.

Meyer she knew K-State would get an allotment of tickets once it definitely was going, so Streetside was trying to "be a good neighbor" and let K-State sell its allotment first.

She also said many Cornhusker fans had bought Big 12 Championship tickets prematurely.

"Lots of Nebraska fans have been trying to sell their tickets down here," Meyer said.

Lindsey Elliott, senior in human ecology and mass communications, said she thinks the high ticket sales are due to the location of the championship game and availability of the tickets for the game. Elliott said a bowl game, further from Manhattan with fewer tickets available, is more difficult to attend.

"I'm graduating, and time for my new job probably won't allow me to go to the bowl game," she said. "The location of St. Louis is great. It's close and easier for students to go see them, and it may be their only chance."

Bob Cavello, K-State's assistant athletic director for business operations, Pregame parties and tailgating excitement will continue to be a part of Saturday's Big 12 Championship.

The KSU Alumni Association and the St. Louis Convention and Visitors Commission each will be host to activities prior to the K-State vs. Texas A&M football game.

"It will be a chance for K-State fans to get together and put their game faces on," said Jodi McGatlin, the association's director of constituent programs and pregame party organizer.

The pregame alumni party will be in the America's Center, which is connected to the Trans World Dome, where the game will be. The activities begin at noon and will continue until 2 p.m.

McGatlin said the location of the party is important because fans could come to the party and then walk directly to the game and be there for the 3:30 p.m. kickoff.

The Alumni Association has pregame parties at every away game. This one will include speakers from the association, the university administration and the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics. The party also will include the K-State marching band, cheerleaders and an appearance by Willie the Wildcat.

The party is open to anyone, but those in attendance must

Riemann, Halabi win Marshalls

■ Seniors 2 of only 135 in Midwest asked to apply.

COLLEGIAN STAFF

K-State now can add two new names to its list of Marshall Scholars.

Sam Halabi, senior in political science and natural resources and environment science, and Tim Riemann, senior in agricultural economics and pre-law, were two national winners named earlier this week.

In the Midwest alone, only 135 students were chosen to apply for the prestigious scholarship, and 20 were asked to continue through the interview process, Beth Powers, K-State scholarship adviser, said.

The interview process took place in mid-November at the British Consulate in Chicago. Out of the hundreds of students from the six regions, about 40 were chosen.

"They are part of a very special group," Powers said.

Halabi said at first he was shocked, but then the joy sunk in.

"I was actually in disbelief for a while," he said.

The Marshall Scholarship allows students to attend the school of their choice anywhere in England, with all expenses paid, including room and board, tuition, books and meals for two

Senate passes advising bill unanimously

■ Bill also passes setting campaign spending limits.

By TIM RICHARDSON

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A resolution intended to better relationships between students and their academic advisers unanimously passed Student Senate on Thursday night.

The resolution says relations between students and academic advisers should be cooperative and beneficial to both parties.

"All of us have different expectations of our advisers and what that relationship should be," said Rhett Trujillo, Academic Affairs Committee chair. "It's definitely a two-way street."

He said several students have complained about the quality of advising they have received. By emphasizing the cooperative nature of the relationship, advisers can get a better sense of what needs to be done to reach long-term goals, he said.

The burden does not fall only on the adviser. The resolution, which has been looked at by the committee for about a year, says students should be expected to make adequate efforts to communicate with their advisers and be prepared for their appointments.

NASA flight delayed after alarm sounds

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — A loud, flashing alarm went off in the cockpit of space shuttle Endeavour with just 4 1/2 minutes to go in the countdown Thursday, forcing the postponement of NASA's first space station construction flight.

NASA said it would try again early today, though the weather outlook was unfavorable.

The master alarm blared and red lights flashed just before the shuttle was to lift off around 4 a.m. Thursday. By the time controllers traced the problem to a momentary drop in hydraulic pressure and decided to press ahead, it was too late — they had missed the cutoff by a second or two.

"Sure, it's frustrating," said Bill Readdy, shuttle program director and a veteran shuttle commander. "But we do things right. We do things by the book, and we're not going to cut any corners, even if it means just shaving a second or two."

The six astronauts crawled out of the shuttle, and two threw up their hands. Commander Robert Cabana held up his thumb and index finger a half-inch apart: "We were that close."

NASA has only five minutes or less each day to launch Endeavour in order to meet up with the first space station part, which was put into orbit two weeks ago by the Russians.

The problem was confined to one of Endeavour's three hydraulic pressure units. The pressure dropped just long enough to trigger the alarm, then returned to normal. NASA engineers were examining the problem but said they were confident it would not reoccur.

Endeavour's flight already is a year late because of a cash crunch in Russia, one of NASA's partners in building the international space station.

The one-day delay cost NASA about $600,000, mostly in fuel and overtime pay.

Aboard Endeavour is the second station component, an American-made connecting passageway named Unity. The astronauts will use the shuttle robot arm to capture the Russian piece and attach it to Unity.

Convicted murderer to teach at university

PHOENIX — Arizona State University's newest criminal justice instructor can claim experience that no other teachers possess — a murder.

James Hamm, who shot and killed someone when he was a teen-ager, has been hired to teach two courses in the School of Justice Studies this spring semester. The Arizona Republic reported Thursday.

"I think this provides the School of Justice Studies with a unique opportunity to have a former prisoner trained in the law teaching at the university level," Hamm said.

Some have a problem with the latest addition to the faculty.

"This has got to be a cruel joke," Phoenix attorney Dan Cracchiolo said. "It's like Hannibal Lecter inviting Jodie Foster to a tea party."

Hamm pleaded guilty in 1974 to shooting Willard J. Morely Jr. during a drug deal in Tucson. Hamm then was sentenced to 25 years to life in prison and served 17 years before he was paroled in 1992.

Since then, he earned his college degree, then a law degree from ASU. Despite his gains, the state's clemency board refused earlier this year to release him from parole.

Dennis Palumbo, the justice studies professor who interviewed Hamm for the job, said he thinks Hamm deserves a second chance.

"He did something real stupid when he was 17. Why the hell should we condemn him for the rest of his life?" Palumbo said.

Hamm, who failed the state bar exam this summer on his first try, said he does not expect any trouble in the future.

"I never had any problems with the students or faculty in law school," Hamm said. "It was just a problem with the politicians and newspapers."

Award posted to catch escaped Texas convict

HUNTSVILLE, Texas — Officials posted a $5,000 reward Thursday for information that would help catch a killer who escaped from death row on Thanksgiving.

The reward offered through the governor's office came as Gov. George W. Bush demanded answers to how Martin Gurule was able to escape.

"I'm upset about it," said Bush, who had just returned from a Middle East trip. "I've asked the Texas Rangers to step in and answer the question for me and for Texas."

The Rangers are the investigative arm of the Department of Public Safety. A panel of the Texas Board of Criminal Justice, which runs Texas prisons, already is investigating the escape. Huntsville prison officials said Gurule might have been helped by the Mexican Mafia prison gang.

Gurule, 29, scaled a pair of 10-foot fences topped with razor wire and fled into foggy darkness in the first escape from death row in Texas since 1934. Six other condemned inmates stopped when guards opened fire.

No progress was reported Thursday on the search, although the public is reporting plenty of sightings, prison spokesman Larry Todd said. The "wanted" poster with the $5,000 reward was distributed around the state and on the Internet, showing three photos of Gurule.

Gurule was sentenced to death for shooting Minnie "Mike" Piperis during a 1992 robbery at a Corpus Christi restaurant.

Abortion rates remain steady at lowest level

ATLANTA — The U.S. abortion rate held steady in 1996 at its lowest level in two decades, the government reported Thursday.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention said there were 20 abortions per 1,000 women ages 15 to 44 — the same rate as in 1995.

States reported 1,221,585 abortions in 1996, an increase of less than 1 percent from the year before. It was the first time abortions have not declined since 1990, when the total was more than 1.4 million.

Since abortions were legalized nationally in 1973, rates increased steadily until 1980, when they reached 25 per 1,000 women ages 15 to 44. Abortions leveled off through 1992, when rates began falling again.

The CDC said the decline might have been caused by a drop in unwanted pregnancies. Abortion rights supporters have said there also are fewer clinics performing abortions.

87 workers no longer making Scrabble tiles

FAIRFAX, Va. — Today spells the end for the only U.S. factory making those little wooden Scrabble tiles.

Hasbro Inc. is hanging a C-L-O-S-E-D sign at the Milton Bradley Wood Products Co., which has churned out a million of the lettered tiles a day for the past 20 years.

The reason is a 10-point word: business.

Hasbro spokesman Mark Morris said the company began looking at the most efficient way to make each product and decided to get out of the business of producing the tiles itself. Milton Bradley is a Hasbro division.

Eighty-seven people are losing their jobs after doing their part to make the little rectangles that litter coffee tables in one of every three American homes. Scrabble sells 1 to 2 million copies in North America every year and is a 50-year-old favorite guaranteed to turn up under Christmas trees and come out of closets during snowstorms.

"Sometimes it was hard to believe that we still had to make them," said Harold Wright Jr., who worked at the factory for 8 1/2 years. "But the order just kept getting bigger every year."

In a testament to the game's popularity, President Clinton and his wife play Scrabble on vacation. When Americans were held hostage in Iran nearly 20 years ago, they made a Scrabble game out of paper to help pass the time.

John D. Williams Jr., executive director of the National Scrabble Association, said he heard Scrabble aficionados in Jerusalem played Scrabble in gas masks during the Persian Gulf War.

"Scrabble tiles are one of the most recognizable icons, American icons," Williams said.

Morris said Hasbro still is considering contractors both in the United States and overseas, and hasn't decided where its tiles will come from after today.

Bethel wins recycling contest

By JESSE MCCURRY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Results from the aluminum collection contest the week of the K-State vs. Nebraska game are in.

Bethel College placed first, Kansas City Kansas Community College placed second, Pittsburg State University placed third and K-State came in fourth, collecting 566 pounds.

"We ended up beating both KU and Nebraska, so that was really good," said Stacy Meredith, event organizer and junior in geography.

A total of six schools participated in the weeklong competition commemorating America Recycles Day on Nov. 14. K-State's efforts were centered on tailgaters at the Nebraska game. Nearly 3,000 pounds of aluminum were collected from the schools that participated.

"(Tabulation) was done by pounds per student," Meredith said. "K-State had .028 per student. When you have to divide what we collected by 20,000 students, it really hurts the numbers. If the contest were based on straight pounds, the results would have been different."

Robin Linscheid, president of Environmental Club at Bethel College, said she thought the school's recycling program helped Bethel to win the competition.

"We have a really good program in place already," she said. "Regarding the contest, we made signs around campus, called businesses and made a big announcement to the student body to get people really thinking about recycling."

Despite obstacles limiting its success the day of the Nebraska game — the difficulty organizing workers and lack of information to tailgaters — Meredith said she was pleased with K-State's attempt at the event.

"Considering that this was the first year for the contest and it was a relatively last-minute idea, the response was impressive," Meredith said.

Linscheid said she thought the contest is a good idea.

"It's a good way to integrate the schools to help get the message of recycling across," she said.

Meredith said she hopes the competition will grow into an annual event, getting bigger and better every year.

"Next year, I plan on challenging all Big 12 schools as well as the other colleges and universities in Kansas and have two competitions going on simultaneously," Meredith said. "We also hope to have a recycling program set up for all the football games next year."

"We would like to see separate containers for recyclables located in the parking lots so tailgaters could recycle on their own at each game," she said.

Meredith said students will have more opportunities to recycle starting next semester. Nearly $60,000 in City/University Project Fund money has been allocated for K-State's recycling program. Projects funded by the money include 25 clustered recycling units placed on campus, in Triangle and CiCo parks and near city and county offices.

Manhattan offers holiday homes tour

Decorated homes raise money for McCain series.

By ELIZABETH SCHOFIELD
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If you've passed some of Manhattan's most unique homes and wanted to take a peek inside, here's your chance.

Six Manhattan residences will be on display Saturday, donning their best Christmas decorations as part of the McCain Holiday Home Tour.

The tour, which is sponsored by Friends of McCain, is a biennial event which began in 1984.

The tour benefits the McCain Performance Series in McCain Auditorium.

Betsy Young of Friends of McCain said although there are several events going on this weekend, she expects the tour to be well attended.

"It's a shame we're competing with the football game," Young said, "but I think we still sold a lot of tickets."

The $15 ticket admits a guest to all six homes, which can be viewed in any order between 9 a.m. and 4 p.m.

If you do not have a ticket, one will be available at any of the houses on the day of the tour, Young said.

With its Gothic exterior and Victorian interior, the historic Kimble Castle at 2001 Poyntz Ave., owned by Charles and Anne Gillum, is a well-known Manhattan residence, Young said.

"Anyone who has been in Manhattan knows Kimble Castle," Young said.

The Gillums, who bought the house in 1990, said it originally had a walk-in bank vault, ice house and one of Manhattan's first lawn-sprinkler systems.

Other tour homes include the Bechtel residence at 1406 Sheringbrook Dr., the Marsden home at 1300 Sheringbrook Dr., the Levin residence at 1735 Fairview St., the Murray home at 1721 Humboldt St. and the Pi Beta Phi Sorority house at 1819 Todd Road.

A fraternity or sorority house always is featured on the tour. The sorority house will serve as a resting point with refreshments for those on the tour. Coffee, punch and cookies will be available for guests.

The homeowners decorate their homes in seasonal decor and provide information on the details of each room for tour-guide volunteers.

Kathleen Bechtel said the tour of her home will feature the wood furnishings she and her husband have made.

When the Bechtels first were contacted by Young early this year, they were a little apprehensive about having their home on the tour, she said.

"I thought there was no way I could have my house clean, all of it, all at once," Bechtel said. "But then we thought this would be kind of fun."

As attendees of many McCain performances, the Bechtels said they saw the importance of raising money for McCain.

Bechtel said she and her husband started getting their home ready for the tour in September. The house features four Christmas trees, each with a different theme, and more than 5,000 lights.

"Every room is decorated for Christmas," she said.

Each of the homeowners on the tour received a picture of their home done in pencil and ink or watercolor by local artist Phyllis Pease.

Bechtel said their picture is hanging in the foyer to be viewed by home-tour guests.

The six pictures sketched by Pease also are featured on the tickets for the tour.

OUR VIEW

Aggieville needs to fill vacant building spaces

Thanks to Steve Levin and Varney's Book Store, another empty Aggieville space is being filled.

Varney's has been a fixture in Aggieville since 1908. This business' decision to expand proves the commitment it has made to the business district, fellow business owners and the city of Manhattan.

It's a step in the right direction.

But, the void left following the Aggieville fire stands as a constant stark reminder of Aggieville's potential.

It's potential for shopping, bar hopping, eating, concerts — almost anything.

We hope to see more business owners like Levin and Lucky BrewGrille owner Bob Leetch, who recently opened Mighty Fine Doughnuts, continue to re-populate the area. Costello's Pizza and Coco Bolos are other examples of new Aggieville businesses.

The addition of the Campus Theatre building to Varney's brings more retail space to Aggieville, and it saves a tradition. Many of us remember going to see $1 movies at the Campus Theatre.

While it is unfortunate the building can't remain a movie theater, we are happy to see that Levin plans to keep the marquee and other features of the building.

There are still so many opportunities, though. We've lost the businesses in the fire. We've lost Aggieville Pizza. We've lost Varsity Theatre.

The longer these locations stay empty, the less inviting Aggieville becomes both for visitors and business owners. No one wants to open a business in a ghost town.

We urge the Aggieville Business Association to do whatever it can to lure new business. Improvements to any one business or the district itself help everyone involved.

Why not plan some informal surveys of Aggieville patrons to find out what they'd like to see in Aggieville?

The Collegian editorial board's short list includes a movie theater, a combination bar/Laundromat (wishful thinking, we know) and an organic food store.

There are many things going for Aggieville. It's convenient to campus and most of the student housing, it's the oldest shopping district in the state and it's got a lot of character.

Any time someone from out of town comes to visit a friend in Manhattan, one of the first things they ask about is Aggieville.

Business owners like Levin help keep it that way by continuing to realize the true potential of those buildings.

K-State alumnus remembers previous win over Huskers

Editor,

An open letter to Coach Bill Snyder and President Jon Wefald: Thank you very much for the moves you've made over the past decade to bring K-State football to its current level.

I had the privilege to sit in a sports bar in Minnesota and watch the Cats' victory over the Cornhuskers on Nov. 14. I was a student during the previous victory over the Big Red in 1968.

We had Lynn Dickey, a national ranking and a big win over Oklahoma, but otherwise, those were sparse years. I have a lot of pride in being a K-State grad, have had a good career based on the excellent training and education I received and now thoroughly enjoy the Saturday afternoons when the Cats' games reach this far north (Minneapolis/St. Paul, Minn.).

A good friend of mine, Ed Wilson, class of 1968 or so, died a few years back of a heart attack, and I'd like to dedicate this season to that most ardent of football fans. A former fullback for the Frankfort (Kan.) team in high school, Eddie and I shared a lot of memories during and after college, and he would have liked the feeling I have now.

Best of luck in the remainder of the season, and I'll see you in Ames, Iowa, again next year.

— Cliff Turnbull

If only Snyder ran Hale

Building is envy of other colleges, but its contents don't stack up

The whole K-State community is celebrating the current No. 1 standing of our football team and the incredible achievement it has been to have taken the program, in only a decade, from one of the worst in Division IA.

Division IA (in NCAA football terms) consists of the 113 best schools. There are strict membership requirements in such terms as quality of the facilities, attendance minimums and general institutional support. Additionally, these standards must be maintained from year to year. It is no secret that not long ago, K-State was close to falling out of this top group. As we all know, two key individuals, Jon Wefald and Bill Snyder, had the vision and tenacity to get a vast array of people involved in turning the football program around. Together, they did it.

There is a close equivalent to Division IA in the world of scholarship and research. The Association of Research Libraries is an association of 110 of the best university libraries in North America, together with a handful of other top libraries, such as the Library of Congress, that aren't connected with universities. The universities that belong to the ARL are considered to be the top-level research institutions on this continent. As ARL members, they enjoy many important benefits, not the least of which is to attracting and keeping top students and faculty and the research dollars that usually accompany them.

However, K-State isn't in this prestigious group. Just who is?

All of the public universities of the Big 12 Conference, except us, are ARL members — Baylor is private and doesn't belong to ARL. K-State has a list of five peer universities that we consider to be very similar to us: Colorado State University, Iowa State University, North Carolina State University, Oklahoma State University and Oregon State University. All of these, except Oregon State, are ARL members.

Why are we excluded from this top group? Just as Division IA has membership requirements, so does ARL, and, according to these requirements, Hale Library does not measure up. ARL's membership standards include items such as doctoral degrees, expenditures for library services and materials, staffing levels, the number of books and journals the library has, the number and quality of journal subscriptions, the quality of collections and, in general, evidence of sustained institutional support.

Incidentally, the University of Kansas has been an ARL member since 1932 and, in virtually every statistic that ARL uses, it has us beat by a factor of two or more. For example, it has five times as many current journal subscriptions as we do.

Today, our library situation is similar to (and perhaps a bit worse than) our football program in the mid 1980s. We are not the perennial doormat of Division IA — we aren't even in the league!

Is it all hopeless? Not at all. One of the first steps Snyder took when he came here was to upgrade the physical plant as it pertained to the football program. Due to Wefald's leadership, students' contributions, and the gifts and hard work of many benefactors, K-State already has taken the equivalent first step in the creation of the library building. It is the envy of many universities that are ARL members.

Also, just last year, Texas Tech achieved ARL membership after many years of struggle. It did so with most of its critical statistics similar to ours. For the main campus programs and central library, its number of volumes, total expenditures and number of staff all were nearly identical to our figures. However, Texas Tech reports more than twice the number of current journal subscriptions than we have, and it added nearly twice the number of volumes to its collection last year as did we. The main difference between Texas Tech and K-State libraries comes from the fact that Tech has law and medical libraries that can be used to add to its statistics.

We propose that ARL membership for us is not an impossibility. It would be extremely difficult to achieve in only a few years, just as our recent football successes did not come overnight. It is, however, a viable long-term goal, and the sooner we set it as a goal, the better off we will be. As it was with improving the physical library, the road toward this goal will be long and arduous. It will require leadership and commitment. It also will require all of us to pull together and every segment of the university to make some contributions.

Students might be called on for a credit-hour-based fee, researchers might be asked to contribute some of the "sponsored research overhead" that is under their control, the Kansas Legislature might be asked to make special contributions toward the goal, and the KSU Foundation might be asked to find further creative ways to provide support — but working together, with time and fortitude, we can do it.

We need to reinvent democracy; Hulk Hogan for president

VIEWPOINT

TODD PACEY

Welcome back, class. I hope you enjoyed the break, but now it's time to get back to our discussion on the sad state of affairs in American government. In case you missed it, the Joker would summarize the first half of our discussion by saying this country needs an enema.

Not in the literal sense, though, because that's just disgusting.

American politics does need a cleansing, and I am not talking about getting rid of stains or checked-out pants. This is not a column aimed at Bill Clinton, Ken Starr or anyone in particular. This is aimed at those who have maligned the meaning of democracy.

This column is, however, aimed at Hulk Hogan, who is running for president in 2000. Now that would be the stuff that an enema makes flow.

Actually, nothing could be more appropriate than a Hogan victory, as the position mainly is that of a figurehead. Sure, the president is an important person, making important decisions, but in the end, it's not really important who he or she is. Proof of this can be found in two living historical bullying landmarks, Fidel Castro and Saddam Hussein.

Ice Cube would call them the dictators you love to hate.

These two individuals have been playing their parts as the bad guys from president to president, with Castro dating back to JFK, the original D.C. player. For years they have lied to us and threatened us, and we fought battles big and small with little to no progress.

The Tom and Jerry or Itchy and Scratchy of the world.

Yet we have gotten more than involved in Bosnia, Vietnam, Panama, Serbia and numerous other world skirmishes not involving us. After all, we are the world's peace keepers. It seems these two dictators have remained in power for a reason, similar to how Hogan's old pals in the World Wrestling Federation keep around the bad guys in a never-ending battle for belts.

There is a constant struggle between world leaders, with each acting a part. As Shakespeare said, "All the world's a stage." The American president and these dictators truly are players in the theatrical production of world politics.

Big Punisher thinks maybe they just crush a lot.

One thing these charades are crushing is our freedom. Today's grab-all, blame-all, fence-straddling politics are done merely to save face or to gain votes. What they really need to focus on is you and me.

But, not necessarily you and me, because he or she doesn't truly know you or me, you see?

We need to focus on the individual. Stop trying to think about what is best for your party affiliation, your state or your special interest group and start paying attention to the one special interest group that matters, human interest.

Don't forget our furry little friends as well.

The problem lies in the existence of special interest groups. Sure, someone has to stand up for the rights of minorities, but if we haven't got past that yet, there is some serious trouble. We should not have to have watchdogs, for we should be able to trust our politicians with the human interest. So won't you join my brother, Cornel West from Harvard University, and I for a meeting of the minds.

We have been in denial for too long. Whoever invented that catch-all first stage of denial was a genius. You're an alcoholic. No, I'm not. You're in denial. No, I'm not. See?

He said I could invite everyone I wanted but would not tell me where he lived.

We need to take that first step toward democratic rehabilitation and admit we are wrong. Current democracy is not the best solution. We have been in denial for too long. Whoever invented that catch-all first stage of denial was a genius.

You're an alcoholic. No, I'm not. You're in denial. No, I'm not. See?

These ramblings were fueled by a whirlwind of rap music, CNN, professional wrestling, C-Span and cartoons combined with the ever-popular sleep deprivation.

Fund raising dropped from inquiry

Livingston wants vote taken before holidays.

By DAVID ESPO

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C.—Republicans jettisoned campaign fund raising from their impeachment inquiry Thursday, likely clearing the way for a historic House Judiciary Committee vote next week over President Clinton's relationship with Monica Lewinsky and his effort to cover it up.

At the same time, incoming Speaker Bob Livingston expressed a desire for the full House to convene in a pre-Christmas session to vote on any articles of impeachment that win committee approval.

"If the Judiciary Committee could complete its work next week, it would be my expectation that we could have a vote in the following week," the Louisiana Republican said in his first public remarks on the subject in more than a week.

Taken together, the developments amounted to strong signals that majority Republicans — chastened by disappointing election results — intend to move swiftly to wrap up the third presidential impeachment inquiry in the nation's history. Even so, while the GOP-controlled panel is expected to approve at least one article of impeachment on a party line vote, the outcome on the House floor remains in doubt.

Democrats, as well as Republicans including Peter King of New York, intensified efforts during the day to craft an alternative that would stop short of impeachment.

Spokesman Kevin Fogarty said King and several other GOP lawmakers were laboring over a proposal that would "include a strong condemnation of Clinton and require him to pay a financial penalty and issue a statement acknowledging wrongdoing."

Key Democrats met privately with the party's leader, Rep. Dick Gephardt, and — according to two sources speaking on condition of anonymity — they will soon begin contacting Republican lawmakers outside the Judiciary Committee to see what bipartisan cooperation might be possible in the full House. These sources added that while Democrats are willing to join in efforts to wrap up the issue by year's end, they will insist on a lengthy period for debate on the House floor.

There was no end to the skirmishing between the White House and the Judiciary Committee.

In a letter to top White House lawyers, the committee's general counsel, Thomas E. Mooney Sr., said that whoever delivers the formal defense of the president before the committee will be "subject to at least one full round of questioning" by the lawmakers on the panel and staff.

Mooney also wrote that the committee does not have some documents the White House requested in preparation for the defense, noting in particular that internal Justice Department memos related to alleged campaign finance irregularities are in the possession of department officials.

Cookie sale to benefit community organizations

By ELIZABETH SCHOFIELD

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's not too often you see a long line of people waiting for the doors to open at a cookie sale. The sight of more than 1,000 pounds of cookies at a church bake sale is not too common, either.

Cookies, cookies and more cookies are what you'll find at the eighth-annual St. Thomas More Cookie Carousel, which begins at 9 a.m. Saturday at Werth Hall, 2900 Kimball Ave. Yes, people will be lined up at the door awaiting their chance to gaze at the goodies.

"The lines are usually extremely long in the morning," said Debbie Smith, a volunteer who is decorating cookies for the event.

The Cookie Carousel features decorated sugar cookies, gingerbread people, spritz, gingersnaps, peanut clusters and many other holiday treats for sale at $5 per pound. Customers are given a rubber glove to handle the cookies they choose and a plastic container to put them in.

"You just have to walk in, and you're overwhelmed by the hundreds of cookies," said Anne Jardine, publicity director for the event.

The sale has become such a popular event in Manhattan, Jardine stressed the importance of arriving early for the best selection.

"In the past, we have sold out in an hour," Jardine said.

The sale will close at noon or when the cookies are gone.

Last year the churches' parishioners baked more than 1,200 pounds of cookies, setting a record for the event.

Leftover cookies were donated to Manhattan Catholic schools, the Manhattan Emergency Shelter Inc. and other community organizations.

Besides the several rooms filled with assortments of cookies, visitors also can see the festive decorations in the hall, listen to Christmas tunes and try samples of wassail, a German cider drink, with this year's featured recipe, "toffee-topped bars." Recipe cards will be available for patrons to take with them.

"It's very festive," Smith said. "It certainly puts you in the Christmas spirit."

There will be a cafe area for customers to sample their cookie purchases with the free cider.

The sale usually grosses about $4,000, and the proceeds always go to different community organizations, Jardine said.

"We just want to give back to the community," she said. "Part of our church mission is to be involved in the community, and this is our way of doing that."

This year, the sale will benefit two college scholarships for non-traditional female students, the St. Thomas More hand bell choir fund and the Manhattan Crisis Center.

AP selects Bill Snyder top coach in Big 12

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

It was the end of a long and hectic national signing day in college football, and Bill Snyder had just announced all of K-State's new recruits.

Someone approached to congratulate him on Ross Snyder's signing with a nearby community college.

"Who did he sign with?" asked the father of his son.

That's how dedicated Bill Snyder is to his job.

That's the laser-like intensity he brings to what K-State fans proudly call the greatest turnaround in the history of college football and what others call "The Miracle in Manhattan."

That's the dogged, narrowly focused, "shut-out-the-rest-of-the-world" attention to detail which, in just 10 years, has brought the losingest program in Division 1A college history to the brink of a national championship.

No less an authority than former

Oklahoma coach

Barry Switzer

has called

Snyder "the

century" for what he's accomplished.

To no one's surprise, an

Associated Press newsmedia panel could do no less than make him a runaway winner for Big 12 Conference coach of the year.

"All of us would be proud and honored that there's that type of award bestowed on our football team," Snyder said. "Everybody here works hard, not just the head coach — players, coaches and our staff."

As dedicated as Snyder is to K-State's football program, it would be a huge mistake to conclude that this complex man who grew up fatherless is not a good father himself.

A few years ago when his daughter was involved in a car accident, Snyder threw himself into helping her through a painful period of physical rehabilitation. Sean Snyder, an All-

America punter for the Wildcats in 1992, works for his dad as K-State's assistant athletic director for football operations.

Ross, after a redshirt season at

Butler County Community College,

now is a backup running back at K-

State. He said his greatest thrill was watching his dad beat Syracuse in last year's Fiesta Bowl.

"Coach Snyder cares for us as more than just football players," running back Marlon Charles said. "He wants us to learn things that will help us be successful in life long after we're through playing football."

During the sorry state of the moribund program which Snyder took charge of in 1989, nothing less than total dedication would have worked.

The Wildcats, the first Division 1A college program with 500 losses, had two winning seasons and three

NCAA probation since 1954.

They'll take a perfect 11-0 record into the Dr Pepper Big 12 football championship game against Texas

A&M on Saturday, looking for a victory they hope will catapult them into the national championship game in the Fiesta Bowl.

In the 1990s, K-State is 76-27-1 after closing out the 1980s with a 1-36-1 record.

In nearly 10 full seasons, Snyder has won 76 games at K-State. To get

77 K-State wins prior to that, you have to add up all the Wildcats' victories from 1959 to 1988.

Needless to say, Snyder hears often from coaches trying to resurrect losing programs.

His answer is always the same.

"There's no magic to it," he said.

"Whatever degree of success we've had has come from basic things — hard work, intrinsic values and a lot of great, great people I've been fortunate enough to be around here. There's nothing magical about things, if you've got good people."

From the minute Snyder arrived, he's had a full financial commitment from K-State president Jon Wefald to upgrade facilities and hire top-flight assistants.

"They've been very special to us and they've given us the opportunity to do the things all coaches feel they have to do to have success," Snyder said. "There's no secret to it."

The K-State coach drew 11 votes from the panel of sports writers.

Texas' Mack Brown got 7 votes and Texas A&M's R.C. Slocum got one.

Cats to battle Georgetown in NCAA Tournament

By JOSH KINDER

KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Just one day remains until the K-State volleyball team opens its postseason in Provo, Utah, in the Central Regional of the NCAA National Tournament against Georgetown University.

The Cats aren't strangers to the post-season scene. This will be the fourth consecutive year K-State has participated in a national tournament and the third consecutive year the Cats have played in the NCAAAs.

In 1995, K-State played in the National Invitational Volleyball Championships at Kemper Arena in Kansas City, Mo. It was the first time since 1977 that K-State received a berth in a postseason tournament. K-State went 2-2 that year with wins over Drake and Rice.

It wasn't until the 1996 season that

K-State reached the NCAA National Tournament for the first time in school history. The Cats won their first match of NCAA play at home over Cal State-Northridge but lost in the second round at Washington State.

In Coach Jim McLaughlin's first season at the helm of the team, he continued the team's recent post-season success by taking the team to the University of Southern California, where they lost to San Diego, 3-1, in first-round play.

"This team is just playing the game of volleyball better and at a higher level," McLaughlin said. "This team is better in all facets of the game. I think we have potential to do a lot of things well, and we've shown that the last four weeks. Our numbers are up, and we're just playing in a better rhythm. I like being just a little bit more polished than we were last year."

Senior Val Wieck has been a part of the Wildcat resurgence that started in 1995. She said this team differs from others she's played on because of the large number of freshman on the team.

"Each year it's a different team, but this year just because there is six new freshman," Wieck said. "It's really exciting at first, because you have all these new girls come in. It was like a gang of them. Just getting to know all of them, showing them the ropes on getting used to college life and volleyball. That's something I'll remember. That's what makes it unique."

Georgetown University finished with a 24-5 record and 10-1 in the Big East Conference and co-champions.

"They're good. They've got two left-side hitters," McLaughlin said. "If you have to be good anywhere, you want to be good on the left side. They've got a good quick hitter, too, but what I like is that we're good on the left side too. It'll be a good battle, but I think that if we play well, we'll control them."

The Hoyas will feature a freshman phenom from Moscow, Yulia Vityurina won the Big East Player of the Year.

McLaughlin said he knows she is good, but he feels that his own player, Liz Wegner, is a better player.

"Their freshman from Russia and sophomore Kiran Gill from Illinois are good players, but I think Liz Wegner is better than both of them," he said. "We just have to play well as a team and we'll be fine."

K-State has their own freshman standout in Disney Bronnenberg, who is playing in her first NCAA Tournament. Last weekend, in the loss to Colorado, she became K-State's single-season record holder for assists. Bronnenberg also is enjoying a good season in the national ranks as the nation's current leader in assists.

"I was very excited about the record, but I think I overlooked it this week," Bronnenberg said. "I was just so excited about making it to the tournament. The girls have worked for this all season. We're just getting ready to go and play hard."

McLaughlin said he is pleased with her play and said Bronnenberg will continue to be a power on the college level.

"She's worked very hard for this," McLaughlin said. "She's improved week to week and really made a breakthrough about four weeks ago. She is understanding the demands of the setting position. She works very hard, and that's why we wanted her. She has quick feet, good hands and a heart. She's going to be great, and she's on her way."

KSDH-FM 91.9 will broadcast the Wildcats' games throughout the NCAA Tournament. Coverage begins at 5:45 tonight with the Jim McLaughlin Show. Game coverage begins at 6. If the Cats win their first match, DB92 will broadcast K-State's second-round match on Saturday starting at 7:45 p.m.

Commerce Bank Classic to serve as good opportunity for Cats

By JOHN BERGGREN

KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

There's a lot on the line this weekend for the K-State women's basketball team.

No, it's not do-or-die time, but it is a crucial time in the Wildcats' scheduling this season. After opening the season with a 2-3 record, K-State will be host to the Commerce Bank Wildcat Classic tonight and Saturday evening in Bramlage Coliseum.

Detroit will face San Diego State in the opening game of the tournament at 5 tonight, followed by K-State vs. Army at 7. The consolation and championship games will be played at 5 and 7 p.m., respectively, Saturday.

This tournament is important to the Cats for various reasons. K-State needs to get on a winning roll with only three non-conference games remaining before the Big 12 conference season opens. The Wildcats also need to establish some "continuity," as Coach

PATTERSON

Deb Patterson said, with every guard in the program hampered by at least some sort of injury.

The Wildcats' latest injured guard is senior Jenny Coalson, who has battled back problems throughout the season. Coalson's problems have escalated to the point where she will miss the next three to four weeks to undergo treatment.

"It's hard to replace a senior with a sophomore, and Jenny is a great loss, and we just have to hope the best and continue to move on, and that puts a lot more responsibility on our guard's shoulders," Patterson said. "We miss her consistency as a rebounder and as a passer, and we've missed her leadership a great deal on the floor. Also, we've played like a team without an identity without her."

The sophomore Patterson referred to is Kim Woodlee, who still is dealing with off-season surgery on her right leg.

"Her leg is fair, and I'm not going to say it's good," Patterson said. "She's still experiencing some pain and some difficulties with that and always has swelling."

"I think it's a situation where you have someone who is very tough and very courageous, playing hard, trying to get back into shape and trying to establish a rhythm for herself and is still playing with a lot of pain," she said.

Freshman point guard Essence Perry still carries a cast on her left hand with a broken finger, and freshman shooting guard Kristin Rethman also is playing with a splint on her shooting thumb.

"This is a big weekend for us," Patterson said.

"I think we've addressed the fact that we've got to become more solidified, and we've got to establish a core group, and hopefully, we'll continue to play through the adversity of some of these injuries. But in spite of that, it's time to move ahead."

"We've just got to get a couple wins this weekend, and I know our team is very determined and focused toward that goal," she said.

Manhattan Parks and Recreation looking for youth basketball coaches

By SARAH CRAIG

KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Anyone familiar with basketball is invited to coach a youth basketball team as part of the City League Youth Basketball Program.

The season begins Jan. 9 and goes through March 14.

Mike Buchanan, recreation supervisor for the Manhattan Department of Parks and Recreation, said the program needs six to eight coaches for children in grades 5 through 8. The league is split into two divisions, grades 5 and 6, and grades 7 and 8. There are 50 teams in the program needing volunteer coaches.

Buchanan said people have coached for various reasons.

"In addition to liking kids and having an interest in basketball, we have education majors who are looking for experience, people who are looking for coaching certification, or it can also be some sort of a class assignment," Buchanan said. "It looks good on a résumé."

The program consists of two practice sessions and one game a week, adding up to about 3-4 hours a week. Coaches can choose between boys' and girls' teams. Previous coaches said they had positive experiences.

"I like working with kids. I like the way they come together. I like seeing how good you can make them by the end of the year, and I like to coach my son," said Allan Liekam, HVAC supervisor for facilities in Dykstra Hall. This will be Liekam's third year coaching with the program.

"It's a good opportunity to stay active, stay involved in the sport and help some kids out along the way," he said.

Todd Clark, staff assistant at Haymaker Hall, said he finds coaching youth to be a learning experience. Clark has coached baseball, soccer and basketball.

"The kids don't know you. They don't know who you are or what you're about, but I think once you get over some of the initial rocky times then they really warm up to you," Clark said, "and I think they end up appreciating you a little more, because sometimes you're more like an older brother than a father figure."

Although there is a time commitment, Clark said the experience will be worthwhile.

"Go for it," he said. "It may seem like it won't fit in your schedule, but if you're able to make time for this and make it a priority, it's one of the most rewarding experiences you can have."

Those interested can contact Buchanan at 587-2757.

Respect, championship on line against Texas A&M

The march for respect goes through St. Louis this weekend. After victories against ranked conference foes Nebraska and Colorado did little to increase K-State's spot in the Bowl Championship Series rankings, the No. 1 or 2 Cats (11-0, 8-0 in the Big 12 Conference) have one last opportunity to impress the voters and possibly move into the top two with a victory against 10th-ranked Texas A&M (10-2, 7-1). The 1998 Dr Pepper Big 12 Football Championship Game is Saturday at 3:35 p.m. at the Trans World Dome in St. Louis.

A victory against the Aggies would cap off the first perfect season in K-State history and would end a 64-year conference championship drought. The Cats last finished on top in 1934, when K-State claimed the Big 6 title with a 7-2-1 record.

However, these are different times, and there are different stakes are riding on this showdown for the Big 12 crown. While the Cats remain third in the Bowl Championship Series, with the final poll to be released Sunday, everyone from computer-rankings guru Jeff Sagarin to members of the news media have speculated that a convincing K-State victory would carry the Cats into the BCS' top two, ensuring a date in the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl and a shot at the national title.

With the pressure and confusion that the BCS has created for K-State over the last half of the season, signs of frustration surfaced at Tuesday's press conference. Coach Bill Snyder said the formula "seems like it has to get tweaked" after the Cats' consecutive wins against highly ranked Nebraska and Missouri did relatively nothing to their standing and Tennessee lost points after a 41-0 victory over Vanderbilt last weekend.

A number of players echoed Snyder's thoughts, including senior receiver Darnell McDonald, who said the Cats' current No. 3 position was a source of irritation.

"It's real frustrating, because we're No. 1 in the Coaches' (Poll), and I feel coaches know best," he said. "I at least think we should be in the top two in all the polls."

With another top-10 challenger waiting on Saturday, McDonald said he agreed the Cats could send a message to all the pollsters with a convincing victory against the Aggies.

That might be easier said than done.

Before a devastating 26-24 loss to Texas on Nov. 27, A&M was riding a 10-game winning streak, due in part to the improved play of running backs Dante Hall (911 yards, eight touchdowns) and Ja'Mar Toombs (413, two TDs). With a strengthened running game, the Aggies' offense has solidified and created what Snyder said would be the Cats' most complete and toughest opponent of the season.

"They do a very nice job with their special teams, they create field position," he said. "They're sound on offense, they don't turn the ball over."

"Defensively, they play probably as effective as any defensive football team in the country. You put all those things together, and it tells you why they've won 10 ball games," Snyder said.

The effectiveness Snyder mentioned stems from the "Wrecking Crew," which surrenders only 270.2 yards of offense per game.

"The one thing that catches my eye is the way they tackle, as far as everybody coming together as a whole," receiver Aaron Lockett said. "They'll probably resemble a mixture of the top-10 teams we've played this season."

Leading this machine is senior linebacker Dat Nguyen, who became the first player in A&M history to reach 500 career tackles after finishing 1998 with 132.

Snyder said he agreed that Nguyen was the eye of the Aggie storm, and his tackle count was only one part of his arsenal.

"Most youngsters don't get a chance to play that many snaps, let alone get those kinds of statistics," Snyder said. "He can create havoc for virtually any offense. He's quick, he gets to the ball, he blocks off the ball really well. He does all the things that real quality linebackers do."

Nguyen's skill will be put to the test by the Cats' high octane offense, which features five All-Big 12 selections, spearheaded by quarterback Michael Bishop, who averages 286.4 yards of total offense per game, and McDonald, the conference's leading receiver with 69 receptions.

After a season of fulfillment of individual ambitions and team goals, McDonald said Saturday's contest boils down to a seven letter word.

"We're really not getting any respect at all," McDonald said. "If we play a close game with Texas A&M, we won't be going to the national championship game, which we should be doing."

"This weekend, we're going to try and go out and get all the respect we can get through Texas A&M," he said.

"WE'RE REALLY NOT GETTING ANY RESPECT AT ALL."

Lab provides children classroom for learning

Instructor Judy DeLong interacts with one of her students Thursday afternoon at the Early Childhood Laboratory. DeLong was helping the student with a puzzle.

In one corner sits a makeshift space shuttle. Behind the shuttle, an American flag hangs. This scene — similar to what is seen at a pre-flight NASA press conference — is part of the learning process at the Early Childhood Laboratory.

"It is nice to have the experience at school as well as being able to talk about it at home when the children see the space shuttle on television," said Marjorie Pritz, lead teacher at the laboratory.

The Early Childhood Laboratory is a preschool on the K-State campus that incorporates children with developmental delays and disabilities into an environment with typically developing children. LuAnn Hoover, program director at the laboratory, said there has been a collaboration for seven years with Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 and the School of Family Studies and Human Services for the inclusion of children with disabilities in the laboratory.

The district identifies those children who have developmental delays or disabilities and then provides educational services for the preschool to incorporate those children with special needs into a setting with typically developing children. Head Start in Manhattan has a similar program.

"The unique aspect of this program is that it is inclusive," Hoover said. "I believe children learn best through play and interaction with other children."

Specialists such as speech therapists, occupational therapists, teachers of the deaf, and hard of hearing and vision specialists are provided by the district as the children need them. Hoover said these therapies can be delivered through the children's play and will be more beneficial and meaningful to the child.

"We teach children to be accepting of diversity and differences in people. These are lifelong teachings that they are learning at an early age," Hoover said.

The laboratory is divided into two rooms. A certified teacher in early childhood education is assigned to each room. A maximum of 10 to 12 children are enrolled for each of the three-hour morning and afternoon sessions.

The ages of the children range from 3 to five years old. If the child is eligible for kindergarten, he or she cannot attend the sessions at the laboratory because it is a pre-kindergarten environment. The teachers try to provide a classroom setting where each individual feels like part of the group.

"It is feeling that we are all a part of a team and part of a group. We all have strengths, and it is important for the kids to feel like the classroom is their own," Judy DeLong, lead teacher at the laboratory, said.

Outdoor activities, as well as many indoor activities, are provided in the lesson plans to try to incorporate each child's developmental level. DeLong said the goal is to give the children a feeling of ownership and to help them succeed.

"This is like a little world," she said. "Life is made up of all kinds of people and abilities. We try to teach them to be accepting, and that's how life works."

Hoover said the staff tries to expose the children to early literacy. The teachers do this by having the children sit in a circle and listen to a story. Many times, a story will be read throughout the week with the children acting it out or doing other activities associated with it.

"It is important for children to be exposed to books at a very early age. It gives them the idea that books can be fun and educational too," Hoover said.

One thing both Hoover and DeLong said is when a child who has a disability begins coming to the laboratory, they do not prepare the children for it. In this way they are not magnifying that the child is different.

"I am amazed at the things children do not notice," DeLong said. "The children that have disabilities will be met their whole life with questions, so this way also lets them learn how to answer them."

The laboratory also serves as an educational device for K-State students in the early childhood education field. Hoover said there are students who come and observe the children as well as interact with them.

"They are getting a hands-on experience to do what they have read in textbooks," DeLong said. "Until they get into the classroom, they don't know what works and doesn't work."

Through this program, children are experiencing early in life that everybody is different while having fun at the same time.

"It is a pleasant time in their lives. We try to have a setting that the children are happy in and have fun," DeLong said.

K-State provides child care

S hari Camacho, freshman in human ecology and family studies, goes to class just like any other K-State student. However, before her first class, she drops her 4-year-old son off at the KSU Child Development Center.

"Since I can't be with him 24 hours a day, I want someone who can almost fill my shoes when I can't be there," Camacho said.

There are many child-care facilities in Manhattan including three on the K-State campus. The KSU CDC, the Hoeftin Stone House Child Care Center and the Early Childhood Laboratory all are open to K-State students, alumni, staff and faculty. However, between tuition and child care, the costs can get high.

"Child care is expensive everywhere," said Renee Martin, assistant director of the KSU CDC. "These students don't have an income, and with children, living expenses will be more."

The KSU CDC has 165 children enrolled in its program. The center takes children from ages 12 months to 12 years old, but does not have an infant program.

Martin said the center hopes to have an infant program, but it first must find available space, the financial means and receive a license to have infants. There are three levels of rates at the CDC, depending on the parents' income.

Camacho said her son had been in two other day-care facilities previous to the CDC. However, she said she never saw any one-on-one attention or affection toward the children.

"I have to take loans out to cover the cost of child care, but if he is benefiting from the experience and learning positive things, then I will continue paying," she said.

Mary Delucie, director of the Early Childhood Laboratory and the Hoeftin Stonehouse Child Care Center, said both centers are licensed and accredited in early care and education programs. This means activities center on the total development of the child and are based on the child's interests.

"In the past few years, scientific studies have shown that children are learning all the time. It is now more apparent to parents and providers that children be in a learning experience," she said.

The Early Childhood Laboratory is an inter-agency program between the School of Family Studies and Human Services and Manhattan-Ogden USD 383. The district identifies children who have developmental delays and disabilities and tries to mainstream them into the preschool program.

"It focuses on children first, rather than the disability," she said. "The children see the similarities between people rather than the differences."

The Early Childhood Laboratory accepts children between the ages of three and five. The daily rate for a three-hour session is $8.25. The Hoeftin Stone House is on a sliding schedule with rates based on the age of the child and the parents' income. It accepts children from 18 months to five years old.

Both Martin and Delucie said the rates at the three K-State child-care centers were comparable with others around Manhattan.

Patty Cole, director of the Regency Day Care and Learning Center in Manhattan, said not many K-State students bring their children to the center.

They have had a few in the past, but most students, she said, probably find it difficult to afford child care.

"Children are not born with social skills. This is a good environment for them and prepares them to deal with separation from their parents," she said.

Adene Winter, executive director of the Manhattan Day Care and Learning Centers, said although they do not have many children of K-State students enrolled, child care is important to both the child and the parents.

"Day care permits parents to work, attend school, and have a support system from other parents. The children receive social and developmental skills in an appropriate environment as well as educational opportunities," she said.

All of the centers have activities for children, some based on themes. Projects surround these themes such as art, singing, reading and circle time.

"No matter what time I come to pick my son up, no one is yelling or disrespecting the children. The teachers are good with the kids, and it is a positive atmosphere for him," Camacho said.

BIRDHOUSE ARTIST TO PERFORM

Prasada-Rao will give preview of new release

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In promotion of his new album, guitarist and lyricist Tom Prasada-Rao will make a stop in Manhattan this weekend as the final BirdHouse artist of the season.

Prasada-Rao will perform selections from the recent release "Hear You Laughing" at 8 p.m. Saturday at the Manhattan Arts Center. Besides performing selections from "Laughing," the singer/songwriter is expected to give a sneak preview of his upcoming compact disc release, a compilation of holiday carols, both traditional and contemporary.

"He's an expert musician — very knowledgeable in jazz concepts," BirdHouse co-founder David Kamerer said. "We've had him in Manhattan twice before, but this will be the first time he's had the stage to himself."

Prasada-Rao first visited Manhattan in December 1995 when he performed at a benefit concert for Manhattan's Habitat for Humanity. The musician's acoustic style quickly won over the talent bookers of BirdHouse.

"His performance was a tremendous success," Gretchen Holden, BirdHouse co-founder, said. "He has a compassionate personality that comes through in his style."

April 1996 brought about Prasada-Rao's next BirdHouse show as a member of the folk/acoustic group Sherpas. Although Sherpas has not recorded an album together, the group has played to rave reviews around the country.

Prasada-Rao was born in Ethiopia and raised near Washington, D.C., and several years of college in India and England lend to Prasada-Rao's international flavor. His unique sound has won him a 1993 Kerrville New Folk Award as well as the title of Best Folk Contemporary Male Vocalist at the 1993 WAMMIES.

"The first word I would use to describe him is spiritual," Kamerer said. "He is alert to social issues but not bitter about them."

Opening for Prasada-Rao is relative newcomer Chris Rosser, a singer/songwriter and expert guitarist from North Carolina. Rosser's debut solo CD, "Archaeology," is a self-recorded album touted as one of Christine Lavin's (a previous BirdHouse artist) Top 10 releases of 1998. This acoustical musician is known for the warm, hopeful style in which he plays.

"We're sometimes criticized about not featuring artists relevant to college students," Kamerer said. "Chris has a younger voice, so I think that he will appeal to the younger crowd."

Tickets for Saturday's show are $10 for regular admission and $8 for students.

They may be purchased at the Dusty Bookshelf in Aggieville or the Arts Center Box Office. BirdHouse's spring schedule will be announced after the performance.

While the discounted price for students is designed to pull in a younger crowd and introduce them to the acoustical scene, Kamerer said not as many students attend the shows as he would like.

"The arts center is so close to campus, and I don't think students realize that," Kamerer said. "We would love to see our student audience grow."

McCain Performance Series to show Dickens' classic tale

By M.A. LOROFF
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The room is dark and a cranky old man cuddles up with his blanket to go to sleep. He never bought any Christmas presents because he hates Christmas. Before the night is over, however, he will have three visitors who will change his life.

The public can witness the transformation of Ebenezer Scrooge during "A Christmas Carol," at 3 p.m. Sunday in McCain Auditorium.

The performance will be presented by the Nebraska Theatre Caravan. The group has been performing the Charles Dickens classic tale across the country since 1978.

Jennifer Nash, publications manager for the McCain Performance Series, said this year is a special one for the caravan.

"It's the 20th anniversary of the caravan's performance of 'A Christmas Carol,'" Nash said. "It's family entertainment for the holidays and has something for everyone."

The caravan takes the audience back to 19th century London with a world of magical sets, Victorian ambience, lavish costumes, dancing, caroling and special effects, such as the mysterious spinning bed.

Nash said the show runs for more than two hours and might scare young children, so it is not recommended for those younger than 6.

Tickets are available at the McCain Box Office.

Cult classic an enjoyable film

UPC's Evil Dead series shows 'Army of Darkness.'

By M.A. LOROFF
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A book bound in human flesh, a skeleton army and a hero who fights the power of evil (when he isn't working at the local retail store) provide the storyline for "Army of Darkness," the Union Program Council's midnight movie showing tonight and Saturday night.

"Army of Darkness," the final movie in the Evil Dead series, continues the story of Ash (Bruce Campbell), an S-Mart employee who must stop the army of the dead from taking over the world.

Armed with a shotgun that works only half the time, an 1988 Olds and a sharp wit, Ash must stop the Army of Darkness from getting the book of the dead and save the girl.

Kaleidoscope chair Chris Heely said the movie, a cult classic, is a no-brainer but an enjoyable film.

"It's a good kind of stress-reliever before dead week and finals," Heely said.

Chris Wisdom, freshman in speech and rhetoric, said the movie is crude but hilarious.

"The best thing about the movie is Ash's one-liners," Wisdom said. "The guy is really a pig."

The movie is directed by Sam Raimi, who also directed the other Evil Dead films and "Darkman."

'Enemy of the State' gives viewers touch of reality

By RYAN DOOM
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Do you ever get the feeling you are being watched? Maybe someone is following you. Did you check your phones? They could be tapped.

The new film "Enemy of the State" takes these fears and doubles them.

The paranoia begins when a Washington, D.C., lawyer, Robert Clayton Dean (Will Smith), runs into an old college friend while shopping. His friend, who caught the murder of a congressman on film while videotaping wildlife, runs past Dean while fleeing from government agents and slips the video into Dean's holiday bags without his knowledge. Though he is unaware he has the evidence, the agents, led by Thomas Brian Reynolds (a stiff Jon Voight), track Dean down to get the tape back. When Dean denies he has it, the games begin.

Reynolds has Dean's house bugged and monitored. The agents cancel all of his credit cards, tell the press of a secret affair and even attempt to frame him for murder. Heck, they go as far as to spray paint his dog.

After his wife kicks him out of the house, Dean is out on the street a few hours before the agents decide to come after him. The only person who can help is a contact known only as Brill, played by Gene Hackman, who is virtually playing the same character as he did in Francis Ford Coppola's "The Conversation." Brill turns out to be a techno wizard who practically invented all of the devices Reynolds is using. Together, they decide to go on a mission.

Director Tony Scott (Top Gun) and mega producer Jerry Bruckheimer (Armageddon) have come up with a techno-paranoia movie that leaves its audience, well, paranoid.

The entire movie is seen through the eyes of binoculars, satellites, and video monitors that give the feeling of no privacy.

The spy satellites the trackers used can take a picture of a license plate. It is told that any phone line can be tapped at any time. The movie leaves you feeling insecure about everything.

What makes this film work is the use of technology. Every device is so state-of-the-art that it leaves no question as to what the government or anyone is capable of with the right equipment.

Of course, give the film a couple of years, and it will come off looking like any 1980s computer movie does now — low tech.

years.

"It is not often that you get to go to one of the world's best universities for nothing," Powers said.

Both Halabi and Riemann have chosen to attend Oxford University. Riemann will be working on his masters of philosophy in developmental studies, and Halabi will be doing comparative social research.

Powers said the Marshall Scholarship means a great deal not only to Halabi and Riemann but to the people supporting them and to K-State.

"For their family, friends and teachers who supported them, this result of the past four years at K-State is a great payoff," Powers said.

"It also helped everyone here see that K-State is a fine institution, and it is a sign to freshman and sophomores that if they want to do something like this, it can be done."

K-State now has had 10 Marshall Scholars since 1984.

In addition to the Marshall Scholarship, Halabi also is a finalist for a Rhodes Scholarship. He is one of two Kansas residents who will be competing in the eight-state regional Rhodes competition.

Halabi will be interviewing today and Saturday in Minneapolis, Minn.

Nationally, 32 Rhodes Scholarship are awarded each year. Each scholarship is valued at $40,000 to $60,000 and also will pay for two years of study at Oxford.

Halabi said he is relaxed and looking forward to his Rhodes competition interview.

"I'm really lucky," he said. "It is going to be a chance to meet a lot of great people."

have reservations with the Alumni Association.

"There are already 1,500 people signed up," McGatlin said. "We have reservations for people from North Carolina, California and Texas."

Along with the pregame party, the St. Louis Convention and Visitors Commission is having a tailgating party at the Baer Plaza, located across from the Trans World Dome.

"Our goal is to provide a thrilling and extraordinary tailgating party with a college hometown atmosphere," said Gary Schurk, sales manager for the St. Louis Convention and Visitors

Commission.

The party will include pep rallies, live music, food and beverages.

"K-State's marching band will make an appearance along with Texas A&M's yell leaders," Schurk said.

Admission is free, and the party is open to the public. The activities will begin at 11 a.m. and last until 3:30 p.m.

"It is pure speculation how many people will be there, but we hope to have around 20,000," Schurk said.

SENATE

Student Senate also passed a bill limiting the amount of campaign money that can be raised by a student body presidential candidate. Each presidential ticket may spend a maximum of $2,000 in the general election, with no more than $50 from one person.

The previous spending limit was However, some students will be cheering for the Wildcats from Manhattan.

"I wish them the best of luck, but I will be working and wearing my lucky purple underwear that I wore when we beat Nebraska," said Poopsie Bauer, senior in graphic design.

Those going to the game can see what the view will be from their seat, Meyer said, by logging onto the St. Louis Rams' Web page at www.stlouisrams.com and taking the virtual reality tour of the TWA Dome. A view of the field can be displayed from every section.

"The furthest end zone seats even look good," she said.

$815 but did not include T-shirts as an expense, as the current bill does.

"We will know everything going on, instead of like last year where we had to guess," said Josh Rengstorff, Senate Operations Committee chair.

The bill, which passed 38-9, also puts a limit on the amount candidates can contribute to their own campaigns. No more than $1,000, or $500 from each candidate on the ticket, can be used to campaign.

The Texas A&M football team rushes the football field as K-State free safety Lamar Chapman (1) hits the ground dejected. Texas A&M's Sirr Parker scored the winning touchdown on Chapman in double overtime Saturday as part of the Dr Pepper Big 12 Football Championship Game in St. Louis. K-State was defeated 36-33.

THE DREAM IS DEAD

In what was supposed to be the final step before the game of all games, the K-State Wildcats were put in a spot they hadn't been in 19 games, the role of loser.

Eleven regular-season wins, a Big 12 Conference North title and a No. 1 ranking still left K-State with an unanswered dream — the dream of a national championship. Those dreams were shattered when Texas A&M running back Sirr Parker dashed across the end zone in the second overtime, handing the Aggies a 36-33 win and a Big 12 Conference title and sending K-State to defeat.

Dreams of a second Fiesta in Tempe, Ariz. ended — those dreams that seemed so real when the stadium announcer announced a UCLA loss. K-State controlled its own destiny. Win and they were in.

Instead, these holidays will have a much different flavor for the Wildcats. Instead of battling for a national championship against No. 1 Tennessee, K-State heads to San Antonio and the Alamo Bowl against unranked Purdue.

The purple people packed into St. Louis left the game silently as A&M players and fans celebrated into the night. For the first time in 19 game days, there was no celebrating on this Saturday night.

The mood in Manhattan was not much different.

One bar manager described his popular Wildcat haven as a morgue.

"It's a devastating blow. I feel real bad for the players," said Mark Miller, a manager at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon, said. "They go through the year and win all these games, and then it comes down to one game."

Varney's to preserve theater in expansion

Varney's Book Store owners plan to give Manhattan and Aggieville a new attraction. Varney's, which purchased the Campus Theatre next to it, will be expanding the size of the store.

"We plan to expand our current functions," Steve Levin, owner of Varney's, said. "We're looking to be a comprehensive store. We will be your K-State store."

Levin said he really hadn't planned on buying the space left vacant when the Campus Theatre, a dollar movie theater, closed in July, and said he was disappointed the theater wasn't successful.

"We're disappointed the theater had closed, but when it closed, it made it difficult for another theater to go in," he said. "Since the building was vacant, we decided to look into it."

Levin said he didn't know any specifics at this point but plans possibly to have an area where lectures and art classes could be brought in. He said he wants the store, which has been in standing since 1908, to be a symbol of Manhattan.

"We want a unique store, something K-State and Manhattan can be proud of," Levin said.

Bob Leetch, owner of Lucky BrewGrille and the new business Mighty Fine Doughnuts, said the Varney's expansion is going to be positive for the Aggieville business district. Leetch said Varney's is one of the reasons he chose to open Lucky's at that end of Aggieville six years ago.

"Anything that is an improvement for Aggieville is an improvement for us, and I think anything he (Levin) will do will be better for Aggieville," Leetch said.

Leetch said the Varney's expansion will help the daily businesses in Aggieville, the state's oldest shopping district.

"What we really need down here are more day businesses, more retail," Leetch said. "We want it to be more than a night spot. We want people down here shopping and having lunch."

Leetch said the Varney's expansion should improve the shopping situation in Aggieville and help attract customers.

"I think with us and Varney's, you have two real anchors down here, and with them expanding, that's only going to be better for us," he said.

Seth Lamborn, a senior sales clerk at Streetside Records, said he was pleased Varney's was planning on preserving the historic theater look.

"They're not putting a theater in there, but they are preserving the outside look of it, so that's good," Lamborn said. "Something will be there. It's just wasted space right now. They might as well do something with it."

Levin said Varney's is looking forward to the future.

"Customers need to stay tuned," Levin said, "because Varney's is going into the 21st century full speed ahead."

Manhattan man killed by hunter's stray bullet

CLAY CENTER, Kan. — A deer hunter's stray shot killed a passing motorist whose pickup truck was out of the shooter's line of sight, the sheriff said.

Steven Berggren, 41, of Manhattan, was declared dead at a Clay Center hospital, Clay County Sheriff Gary Caldwell said.

Berggren was shot at 12:30 p.m. Thursday — the second day of Kansas' firearms deer hunting season — as he drove along a county road past a field about 12 miles north of Clay Center, Caldwell said.

"The vehicle was over a rise and out of the sight of the hunters," Caldwell said. "There is no way that the hunters could have seen the truck with Steven Berggren in it from the hunters' location."

"When the hunter shot at the deer, he missed, and the bullet went over the hill, through the driver's window and hit the victim."

The shot struck Berggren in one shoulder and exited through the other, severing his aorta and causing heavy blood loss, Caldwell said.

No arrests had been made as of Friday, and Caldwell would not release the names of the hunters. Caldwell said the sheriff's department had recovered the bullet, and ballistics tests would be conducted on the hunter's guns.

Berggren had worked since 1976 at The Manhattan Mercury where he was an engraver.

Clay Center is in northeastern Kansas, about 30 miles northwest of Manhattan.

Professor's funeral set for today in All Faiths

John D. Parmley, an associate professor of secondary education at K-State for the past 18 years, died Wednesday in Manhattan following an extended illness.

He was 52 years old. The funeral will be at 3:30 p.m. today in All Faiths Chapel, and interment will be at a later date in Dolores, Colo.

A memorial for the Mesa Verde Museum Association has been established, and contributions can be made in care of the Yorgensen-Meloan-Londeen Funeral Home, 1616 Poyntz Ave.

Parmley came to K-State after teaching agriculture in public schools for 10 years in Nebraska and Colorado. He received his bachelor's and master's degrees from Colorado State University and a doctoral degree from Ohio State University.

A member of the American Vocational Association, the American Association for Agricultural Education, the Association for the Advancement of Computing in Education and the George Wright Society, Parmley was innovative in using new computer technologies to enhance curriculums.

He worked with Mesa Verde National Park and Hovenweep National Monument designing education materials for the classroom, and his recent research efforts were recognized internationally.

Michael Holen, professor and dean of the College of Education, said in addition to being a quality professor, Parmley was well-liked by faculty and students and a strong supporter of K-State athletics.

"He was a very big football fan and very interested in technology," Holen said. "He was extra well-liked by both faculty and students and filled a number of roles at K-State. He was always willing to change to fit the needs of his students."

He is survived by his wife, Dianna; a sister, Margaret Looney of Moab, Utah; son Scott Parmley, Manhattan; daughter Sarah Parmley, Colorado Springs, Colo.; stepdaughter Kelly Sue May, Chicago; stepdaughter Misti May, Kansas City, Kan.; and one granddaughter.

Annual Toy Run helps children in need; event continues to grow

■ A Brotherhood Aimed Toward Education collects 4 truckloads of toys, $400.

By JAMI STUMP
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Before the snow hit Manhattan on Sunday, members of the 15th district of A Brotherhood Aimed Toward Education rode their bikes in an effort to collect new and used toys for children Saturday afternoon.

"You can't say no to the kids," said Richard Harrison, chairman of the toy run and Manhattan resident.

"We want to make this day special for the kids, and we appreciate donations from anyone, no matter if you ride or drive."

Check in for the 12th-annual Toy Run began outside the main entrance of the Manhattan Town Center food court. The parade started there and proceeded around the mall, down Poyntz Avenue, turned right on Juliette Avenue, went right on Leavenworth Street and then headed north on Third Street. The parade ended outside of Bob's Diner, where Al Myers, coordinator of Toys for Manhattan, has a toy collection site.

The toys are stored at 1109 N. Third St., and unoccupied building. Myers will open the doors of the building to people in need of toys the next two Saturdays, Dec. 12 and 19.

"We open the doors promptly at 9 a.m. and will stay open until the toys run out," said Myers, who has accepted both used and new toys at his toy drop site for the past 35 years.

Nancy Woodyard, district ABATE representative, said she encouraged people to donate.

"You or your children can go through your own toy boxes and give away toys that may not be used anymore. It is a good feeling to help someone less fortunate," Woodyard said.

This year's event was more successful than past toy runs. Last year, 43 bikes were in the parade, and $385 was raised.

"This year we had 110 bikes, four truck loads of toys, and we made $400," Harrison said. "The event went quite well with the weather cooperating with us. We are looking forward to next year's toy run, which will take place rain or shine on the first Saturday in December."

Harrison said the money collected donations will go toward gifts for teenagers and for batteries. Participants in the toy run came from as far away as Nebraska. Riders also were present from Topeka and surrounding counties in the ABATE 15th district.

Michael Lee, Manhattan resident who has participated in the toy run for the past 12 years, said he has seen the toy run grow and change.

"There are a lot of things during the year that help those in need, but this event opens up the soft side in people," Lee said.

"We must give back to the kids and the next generation."

Toys still are being collected, Myers said, and can be dropped off at the Riley County Police Department or from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. at Myers' home, located at 1111 Colorado St.

University airplanes make travel easier

By AMANDA EWING
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

K-State has 34 flying classrooms.

These airplanes, part of the aviation courses at the College of Technology at K-State-Salina, are used for official K-State travel and flight experience for advanced flight students.

Charles Reagan, executive assistant to the president, said the planes are available to any university office. Over a period of time, nearly every college uses the planes, he said. Students, however, cannot rent the planes.

The planes cost between $45,000 and $650,000. Students do not pay for these planes, Reagan said. Funding for the purchase and maintenance of planes comes from a charge to the users. Depending on the particular plane, the users pay either $1.75 or $2.35 per mile.

The King Air is the largest plane K-State owns and the most expensive to use. The plane seats six, and the passengers have the luxury of a pressurized cabin. Other planes include a Beech Sundowner, a Cessna 150 and a Beech Bonanza.

The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics frequently uses the K-State planes. Bob Cavello, assistant athletic director for business, said the planes are used for some team travel as well as for recruiting.

"It's a lifesaver having a university plane," Cavello said. "It helps us conduct our business in a first-class way."

However, for larger athletic teams like the football team, the university charters a larger plane.

Though the planes are small, only seating from four to six people, their multi-engine status allows advanced flight students to gain further knowledge and flight experience.

The planes are captained by flight instructors and co-piloted by advanced flight students from the Salina campus. Peter Kennedy, head of the Department of Aviation, said the students act as co-pilots when passengers are on board.

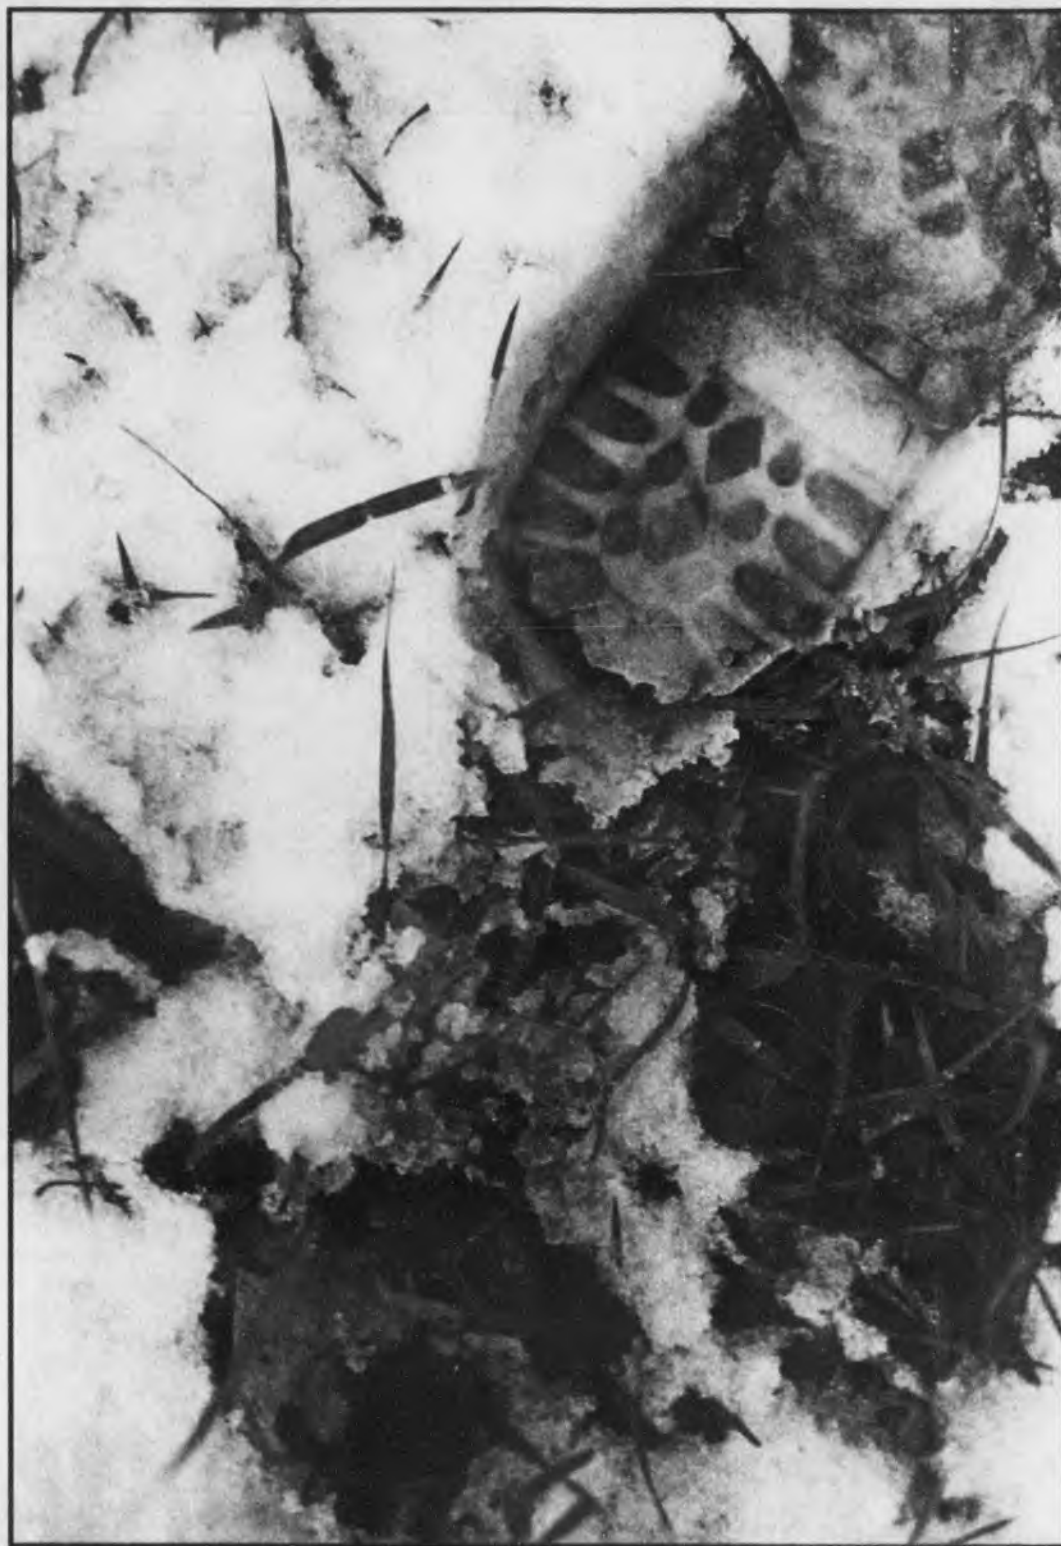

When there are no passengers, students are the main pilots. They must earn a multi-engine license before they can fly the planes.

Students must spend five hours as pilot with no passengers and 20 hours as co-pilot of a multi-engine plane. They pay $50 each time they co-pilot the planes, Kennedy said.

"The idea is to introduce them to the airplane," he said. "It allows them to get on-the-job work experience."

The university planes also give the students the opportunity to fly into larger and busier airports than they would in normal training. Kennedy said they fly into Dallas, Chicago and airports in cities in the Big 12 Conference.

"It gives us the opportunity to go on longer journeys, to higher altitudes and to busier airports," Kennedy said.

SNOW SHOES

A footprint is left in the first snow of the season Sunday afternoon outside Nichols Hall. The forecast calls for continued possibility for rain or snow through Tuesday.

OUR VIEW

Loss will not kill accomplishments

It's hard to describe the bitter disappointment we face in the wake of Saturday's game.

The news of UCLA's downfall received a jubilant response from Wildcat fans in the Trans World Dome.

UCLA lost to Miami. We were Fiesta Bowl-bound. For 2 1/2 wonderful hours, we were going to the national championship. We were vindicated. Our fairy-tale season was going to have a happy ending after all.

We forgot we had to beat the Aggies first. But, we had a big lead, right?

Two overtimes and the game was over.

Things happened in slow motion. There was silence.

Our dreams of a return to Tempe, Ariz., dissolved like a soggy tortilla. Although we're No. 3 in the BCS, we find ourselves going to a bowl game far below our expectations.

We're going to the Alamo Bowl.

To a certain extent, the result isn't all that surprising. Texas A&M was slated to be in the Alamo Bowl, and its unexpected leap into the BCS has created space. The Cotton Bowl had its eyes set on Texas since it beat A&M a few weeks ago, and there's no reason for it to abandon that school now. The Longhorns will bring plenty of fans. It is a fitting final game for Ricky Williams, and Texas deserves to go because it has had a good season.

The biggest source of disappointment is the loss of an at-large bid into the BCS. Florida is a good team, and the Orange Bowl knows it will bring thousands of fans to a bowl in its backyard. It would have been great for K-State, still No. 3 in the BCS, to sneak in, but that is part of the politics that always have surrounded bowl games. It's the nature of the beast.

In fact, those same politics have helped us out before.

We have been the ones to knock more deserving teams into lesser-paying bowls. In 1996, we displaced Colorado. In 1997, No. 10 in the nation, we got an Alliance bid to the Fiesta Bowl, displacing a better UCLA team and knocking it out of Alliance contention.

At this point, however, there is no use dwelling on that. Yes, our fairy tale did come to an abrupt end, but this season, although it didn't end the way we wanted, was another step leading to K-State dominance.

For the first time ever, we went 11-0 and were ranked No. 1. For the first time ever, we are Big 12 North Division champions. ESPN "College GameDay" came to the Little Apple, of all places. We beat Nebraska. We have a Heisman candidate. Martin Gramatica kicked a 65-yard field goal.

K-State football is just as good now as it was before this weekend.

Don't forget that.

Now the challenge we face is to see whether we can recover from that loss. It's a challenge not only for the team but for the fans. We will be judged by how we handle being beaten.

Will we continue to cry about it, or will we remember we are still the BCS's No. 3 team in the country? Will we remember true leadership comes in how you respond to setbacks? Will we remember we are still the best fans in the country? We absolutely dwarf the crowds of other teams when we go to places like St. Louis, Tempe and Dallas. Nobody is as zealous as we are. Remember that.

So how do we look at San Antonio and the Alamo Bowl?

When making travel plans over winter break, remember this will be the last game for our seniors, the players who have been largely responsible for our dominance this year. Remember also that Michael Bishop doesn't take losses well.

We now have very little to lose, considering all we have accomplished already.

Purdue should be our vindication. Who better to beat than a Big Ten team, a conference that continues to steal the Big 12 Conference's thunder?

We hear San Antonio is a fairly nice town. Wonder how it would look painted purple.

Why are my grades so bad? I'll tell you...
Just let me look at some thing first.

Good excuse. Need a good excuse...

Holiday Heedings

A quick course for students in parental conversation

Soon it will be winter break, and all good students are heading home to face the family. The price you have to pay for home-cooked meals and free laundry facilities is high. There will be the usual barrage of questions about classes and relationships. I don't claim to be the Dr. Laura of K-State, but I do have some simple advice.

Here are a few ways NOT to begin any story you tell your parents:

1. I was drunk.
2. It could have been a lot worse.
3. I'm pretty sure I won't lose my scholarship.
4. At least I'm not pregnant.
5. Hey, are you in a good mood?

6. Everything is OK, but ...
7. We have insurance, right?
8. OK, so here's the deal ...
9. Remember that time when ...
10. How much do you love me?
11. Isn't it great that we have such a good relationship?
12. I feel like I can tell you everything.
13. I promise I will pay you back.
14. Remember when you were in college?
15. Have my grades come yet?
16. I should get my license back in a few months.
17. A funny thing happened ...
18. I don't think it goes down in my permanent record.
19. I promise it's not that bad.
20. You're going to laugh at this.
21. She looked old enough.
22. But I got a cool T-shirt.
23. But everyone is doing it.
24. It's all the rage right now.
25. You know, you guys are really great parents.

26. I'm not sure if it's wrong or not, but ...
27. I'm sure you're not liable in any way.
28. Have I told you I love you lately?
29. You've always wanted me to get my name in the paper.
30. You know how you always said ...
31. Is pot really a drug?
32. Sure, you could consider it plagiarism, but isn't it really just building upon the work of others?

PROS AND CONS

Columnist leaves opinion page behind, looks onward to new challenges

To be perfectly honest, being a columnist isn't all it's cracked up to be.

This isn't to say that I'm totally trying to discourage anyone from writing for the Opinion page, but being a columnist is about much more than being able to complain. It's having the rare ability to write about anything from small events in our everyday lives to larger, pressing issues. And (here's the catch, folks) you have to make it good and readable.

Needless to say, it takes a special kind of person to be a columnist. Although I know most of you (especially my colleagues on the Opinion page) are probably laughing at this statement, the Opinion editor will tell you this is true. After all, he's had the misfortune of reading some pretty bad stuff from me over the past few months; on the flip side, at the risk of sounding conceited, I feel that I've penned some fairly decent pieces.

Although I'm glad my stint as a columnist is coming to an end, I admit I have learned several things during this strange trip.

I've learned that the deadline to turn in columns is pretty much optional, because the Opinion editor won't even glance at them until the evening before they are supposed to run. Talk about beating the system.

I've learned that I've never been so happy to receive hate mail in my life. The only real bit of "hate mail" came to me in October from a guy in Texas after I wrote a column about prohibition. Sure, he told me my writing sucked, but I was leaping around the newsroom, yelling, "Someone actually hates my writing! This is so great! WOO HOO!" Of course, all eyes in the newsroom were on me. I suppose I get that warm, fuzzy feeling from knowing someone, somewhere, is reading my work. It's an ego booster, even though it's also nothing short of a death threat.

Lastly, I've learned that column writing is best left to the pros, like Mary Renee Smith, the Collegian newsroom goddess and someone who I respect very much. I gave it a shot, found it wasn't my cup o' joe and am now moving on to bigger and better things, knowing people like Mary are better suited for the task.

Besides, I'm a copy editor at heart. Although I enjoy writing immensely, there's nothing quite like the feeling of taking a bright, shiny, new red pen and "bleeding" all over a page, exposing the countless mistakes made by our staff writers. Call it a power trip, but nothing beats the feeling a copy editor gets when he or she is catching someone else's mistakes. Again, this is another big ego booster for me.

And so, I leave my weekly Monday morning space on the Opinion page for the next generation (I love how dramatic that sounds). I suppose you could say I'm not going out with a bang, more like a fizz.

My future, meanwhile, lies elsewhere, with the ranks of the great desk editors for the spring Collegian staff. So, in a way, both you and I benefit from this: I don't have to make you suffer by writing about ridiculous topics anymore, and you don't have to read my banterings. A better deal, there is not. But if you have any qualms about the Arts and Entertainment page next semester, you'll have to direct all nagging to me. Scary how these things work out, isn't it?

Until then, though, enjoy your winter break and expect great things from the opinion page next semester. It was fun while it lasted, folks. See you in January, and remember to save a glass of eggnog for me.

CES says benefits are subject of negotiation

By JENNIFER WHITE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The interview is over, and the company is making an offer that can't be refused. Before students sign on the dotted line, staff at Career and Employment Services said they should think over the benefits a little negotiation could net.

"The benefit package offered varies from company to company," said Tracey Fraser, director of Career and Employment Services. "Good benefits are not limited to a certain field or profession."

Good benefits to one person might not be so good to another. Fraser said students should evaluate their situations before making a final decision.

"I think it's important that one evaluates their own situation, including their personal and professional needs," she said. "When you start negotiating the offer, you should have a clear sense of what you need to succeed in that position."

Personal needs can include medical, dental and other health insurance, as well as tuition assistance and moving expenses. For some, day care might be an issue.

"The company I accepted an offer from offers a discount on day care," Shelley Randolph, senior in psychology, said. "They contracted with several area day cares, and I get 10-percent off."

Offering discounts on services to employees is just one way companies make their offers more attractive to potential employees. Some might offer professional allowances as well.

"Employers can offer sign-on bonuses, car allowances, even moving expenses and tuition assistance," Fraser said.

Depending on the position, some employers might offer home-office equipment, performance bonuses and profit-sharing opportunities.

"Employers may even offer job-search assistance to spouses, but this varies from company to company," Fraser said.

Randolph said the company that hired her was comparable to similar companies in the job market.

"I think they are fairly average," she said. "They compare closely with other companies I interviewed with."

When offered the position, Randolph said she didn't feel the need to negotiate the terms of her contract.

"I felt the things they offered, such as being able to pick any doctor I want, the retirement plan and the medical insurance, fulfilled all my needs as well as my daughter's," Randolph said.

Fraser said students have three options when considering a job offer—to accept it, reject it or ask for something else.

"You can accept the position," Fraser said, "but you should think it over, set a mutually acceptable deadline for when you have to decide, then consult with family, friends and advisers. Explore any questions that weren't answered when you spoke with the company's representatives."

Unanswered questions can lead to a decision to reject the offer, which Fraser said also is an option. She said students don't have to accept the first job they are offered.

"When the offer is made, maybe you are looking for more than they are offering," Fraser said. "Don't be afraid to ask for something more."

Fraser said something more might be only $5,000 more than the original offer, which figures to be only $13.70 more a day.

"If you figure that $13.70 more a day in benefits such as working conditions or performance evaluations at 3 months instead of 6 or 12 months, the difference can be significant," she said.

Volleyball team bows out of NCAA Tournament in second round loss to Brigham Young

■ Cats beat Georgetown, lose to BYU in 3 games.

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's volleyball season ended at the hands of the No. 7 Brigham Young Cougars in the second round of the NCAA National Tournament in Provo, Utah. The Cougars beat K-State in three games, 15-6, 15-10, 17-15.

In Friday's opening round of the tournament, the Wildcats knocked off the Georgetown Hoyas in a three-game sweep, 15-9, 15-6, 15-7.

The Cats went down early in the first game of the Georgetown match 3-1 but rebounded with a 12-1 scoring run of their own to take a 13-4 lead. The Hoyas outscored the Cats 5-2 to close out the game, but K-State held on to win it, 15-9.

To open game two of the match, K-State hung 11 unanswered points on the Hoyas, with seven of the points coming off unforced Georgetown errors. The Cats sustained a 6-3 Hoya run before eventually downing them, 15-6.

Game three was a tighter affair at times. The Cats started the game with a one-point lead, only to go down 3-1 after a quick Hoya charge. The Hoyas pulled within one at 7-6, but a 7-1 Cat run ended the Hoya's season with freshman Disney Bronnenberg getting a service ace to clinch the second-round bid.

"We didn't play our best match," senior middle blocker Val Wieck said. "But it was one of those things where we were able to get away with it because of Georgetown being Georgetown."

"It's a totally different preparation for teams that you know you should beat. There's a little bit of anxiety. We had the whole package, whereas they didn't."

Game one Saturday night was dominated by the Cougars when they jumped to an early 10-2 lead over the Cats. K-State's bright spot was a 4-1 run that put the score 11-6 before BYU eventually took the game 15-6 on four-straight points.

The Cats showed slight improvement in game two, as they led 4-3 in the beginning. BYU then scored 10 points in a row to push ahead to 13-4. K-State survived six game-points with the score 14-10 but eventually dropped the game, 15-10.

BYU's Nina Puikonen had a staggering 12 blocks in the match.

"We got off to a slow start," Wieck said. "We didn't stick to our game plan. We needed to just bang at the ball like we always do."

"We don't change for them just because they have a bigger block."

K-State led 11-10 at one point in the third and final game, but the Cougars fought back and scored four-straight points — two off of Puikonen blocks — to take a 14-11 lead. The Cats fended off three-straight match-points and tied the game at 14 and then 15. The Cougars finally took the game 17-15 after a late Wildcat comeback.

Puikonen's dominating play helped to end the Cat's season, as she played a part in nine of BYU's 17 points in game three. Despite the loss to BYU, K-State head coach Jim McLaughlin said he was happy with the way his team played in the end.

"I sure like the way we finished," McLaughlin said. "We played hard and got better as we went."

"It's very hard to get into any kind of offensive rhythm against BYU. They defend 30 feet at the net, maybe better than any other team in the country. They have a very solid defensive package."

Although the season ended a little sooner than he would have liked, McLaughlin said he was pleased with the improvements made throughout the season.

"Anytime you end the season with a loss, you're disappointed. But it's a time to be happy because the standards have been set a little higher," he said.

Texas A&M ends K-State's title dreams in double overtime thriller in St. Louis

By JON BALMER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

ST. LOUIS — After months of preparation, days of practice and more than four hours invested in the longest game in K-State history, the Cats' season was decided in just a matter of seconds by Texas A&M on Saturday at the Dr Pepper Big 12 Football Championship Game in St. Louis.

Four seconds, to be exact.

A&M running back Sirr Parker's 32-yard touchdown catch and run in the second overtime session capped off a 15-point Aggie comeback in the fourth quarter, and K-State's bid for the first perfect season in school history ended with a 36-33 double-overtime upset to the Big 12 South champion.

The loss ended all hopes for a return trip to the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl for a shot at the national title. Instead, the Cats will spend the holiday break in San Antonio at the Alamo Bowl on Nov. 29 against Big Ten opponent Purdue.

Before thoughts could shift to the bowl game, K-State players still were trying to comprehend the defeat.

"At no point in time did we feel the game was out of control or out of our hands," offensive lineman Jeremy Martin said. "The team players always believed. We just came out on the short end of the stick today."

Throughout most of the St. Louis showdown, it seemed K-State would have no trouble securing its first conference title in more than six decades. Two first-half touchdown passes from Michael Bishop helped the Cats take a 17-6 lead into halftime. Bishop finished with 341 yards passing, an interception, 101 yards rushing and a touchdown.

Perhaps the most emotional moment of the first half occurred early in the second quarter. With the Cats taking a 17-3 lead after a 66-yard touchdown pass to receiver

Texas A&M's Sirr Parker (8) drags K-State free safety Lamar Chapman (left) across the goal line to win the Dr Pepper Big 12 Football Championship Game on Saturday in St. Louis. K-State lost 36-33.

STEVE HERBER/KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Darnell McDonald, UCLA's upset at Miami was announced to the purple-partisan crowd of 60,798. Although many would see this as a distraction, Martin said it added to the Cats' motivation.

"If anything, it gave us a boost," he said. "From then on, we knew we had to come out and take care of business."

With three quarters of dominating play, the Cats' offense suddenly dissipated in the fourth.

After a rough first half, Aggie quarterback Brannndon Stewart sparked a 10-play, 78-yard drive that ended with a 13-yard touchdown pass to flanker Leroy Hodge. The strike brought the Aggie crowd back to life and drew A&M within one score, 27-19.

K-State failed to convert its next possession into points but stopped A&M on fourth down and 16 at the Cats 24-yard line with 3:26 remaining.

Looking to secure the victory, Bishop scrambled for a first down, but was stripped at the Cats' 35-yard line, giving the Aggies one last chance.

Although the turnover came at the most inopportune time, Snyder refused to call Bishop the scapegoat.

"He is more competitive than most," Snyder said. "Nobody tries any harder. Nobody works harder at it. I think he played very well in this ball game."

K-State headed to San Antonio to play Purdue Boilermakers

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After a 36-33 double-overtime loss to No. 9 Texas A&M in the Big 12 Conference championship game, No. 4 K-State accepted an invitation to the 1998 Builders Square Alamo Bowl Sunday to take on the Purdue Boilermakers on Tuesday, Dec. 29 in San Antonio.

"We're all kind of reeling after what happened," K-State Sports Information director Kent Brown said. "But hopefully we can go down there and give it our best shot."

The Wildcats, the Big 12 North Division champions, finished the year 11-1 and ranked third in the Bowl Championship Series rankings and will participate in their sixth-straight bowl game. Despite their BCS finish, the Cats failed to pick up a BCS bowl bid.

"It's heartbreaking to lose the chance to play in the national championship," K-State president John Wefald said. "It's disappointing to be third in the BCS rankings and not

HEALING EXPRESSION

Art therapy helps disabled children, stroke victims relax, use imagination

Julie Ellsworth is a junior in art therapy. Also pictured is a watercolor self portrait of Ellsworth.

Art usually is something of a luxury developed to impress the imagination and to capture the eye. However, K-State offers a program that goes beyond those aesthetic boundaries and helps people in need.

Art therapy is a program designed to aid the elderly, stroke victims and disabled children through artistic expression and psychological interaction.

Karen Lauseng, art adviser, describes art therapy as a combination of psychology and art.

"One can graduate from K-State with a degree in pre-art therapy, and then move on to receive a master's degree elsewhere," she said.

Courses needed to fulfill a concentration in pre-art therapy include Watercolor I, Painting II, Art for Exceptional Individuals, Approaches to Art Therapy, Psychology of Childhood and Adolescence, Abnormal Psychology, and Fundamentals of Perception and Sensation.

In addition, another 21 hours in art and psychology must be taken, along with basic general requirements in the bachelor of fine arts program, for a total of 120 hours.

Lauseng said the K-State program is reputable and quite strong.

She said that K-State students have gone on to graduate school at institutions such as the Chicago Art Institute, the College of Notre Dame in Belmont, Calif., and Lesley College in Cambridge, Maine.

Lauseng said students in the art-therapy program generally are communally involved, providing great experience for their career interests. She also said a great deal of work is done with professionals at places such as Manhattan Head Start Program, Pawnee Mental Health Services, Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan, and the Manhattan Crisis Center.

Tracy Spann, sophomore in art therapy and special education, said she chose the major because she had prior experience at a church camp, where she helped children with special needs create art.

"It's so amazing to see what these children can make," she said. "I remember this one little boy who had Down syndrome. Although many would be led to believe that Down syndrome children are uncoordinated and incapable of creating art, this boy would go beyond those expectations and create stories through art. He had a love for monsters and would escape from everything and develop his imagination with the monster stories."

Spann described art therapy as relaxing through art.

"You don't have to be an awesome artist in order to be an art therapist," she said. "You use creativity instead of skills to think of projects."

She explained that those with mental disabilities cannot always replicate art work, but definitely can express what they want to convey. Furthermore, activities such as finger painting help stimulate feeling, a sense sometimes lacking in people with Down's syndrome.

Spann said art therapy gives her instant gratification.

"The biggest reward of art therapy is an instant result of accomplishment," she said. "It boosts the children's confidence to be able to interact with normal children during art classes, which is quite obvious through their happiness."

Besides helping others by doing something she loves, Spann said the best thing about art therapy is the relaxed atmosphere.

"I can go to work and still get to wear my overalls," she said.

Julie Ellsworth, junior in pre-art therapy, recently joined the program. She said she enjoys art as well as working with people.

"Last summer, I worked at a hospital in the art-therapy area," she said. "It was great to be able to partake in such an experience."

Ellsworth said she worked with people of all ages. They engaged in activities such as looking at different magazines and describing their feelings about the pictures and words they found, drawing pictures, and playing other games.

"Art therapy is just helping by doing what you love," she said.

Ellsworth said she would like to work in a psychiatric hospital once she has acquired a postgraduate degree.

PATTERNS OF HUMOR

3 local artists to feature watercolor, silkscreen, monoprint, papier maché in show

By RUSSELL FORTMEYER

KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

Artists Susan Ellis Oviatt, Ann Carter and Sylvia Cale Beeman just might be the most accessible and consistently enjoyable artists working in Manhattan today.

Constantly showing their work in coffee shops, on campus and in local galleries, the three women have succeeded cleverly in adding a perverse wit and feminine wisdom to the Manhattan art scene since the early 1990s. They are currently subjects of a show at the Manhattan Arts Center through Jan. 10.

As artists, they complement each other well. Oviatt's watercolor collages pieced together like quilts fill the non-representational gap of the heavily narrative pieces of jokesters Carter and Beeman.

The show's title, "When Walls Speak," suggests we are to find a significant message in this work. Perhaps. As a whole, the show is light and amusing, but there is a conscience underlying some of the work.

Carter, who is showing small silkscreens and monoprints, draws little scenes of domesticity in a personal cartoon style. Humorously descriptive titles give each work meaning.

"Becky's Boy Goes to Bat," silkscreen, consists of four women lounging on lawn chairs, apparently watching their children play baseball. One woman looks back at Becky, who appears nervous for her son. It's a subtle piece, poking fun at the highly aggressive bragging game mothers play off their children.

"Same Husband, New Wallpaper," monoprint with collage, sends up the obsessive wife searching for substance in do-it-yourself remodeling. Such are the undercurrents of Carter's approachable work.

As an artist, Carter keeps it simple. She uses bold, bright colors and geometric patterns to give her drawings energy. Her figures are exaggerated with expressive contour line. The work's perverse humor is thus heightened by a technique that seems ripped from the pages of children's books.

Beeman works in papier maché, creating crafty diorama-style stories that are darkly humorous. In "No Time For Love," a frog with its tongue armed and ready waits as two sprightly fairies kiss in midair, but just within eating distance. "When A Watermelon Dropped On the House" speaks for itself.

Beeman doesn't let us forget these are constructions — she exposes the newspaper and sometimes even the messy support structure beneath it. Like Carter's drawings, Beeman's art is childlike. This is especially evident in the less-than-precise assembly of "Watermelon."

She also can create a dazzlingly elegant figural piece like "Hands Off," a female nude. She's taking a figure-drawing class this semester from Terri Schmidt — the local figure-drawing expert — and it shows. The grace of "Hands Off" is in large contrast to her messier stuff.

Although narrative is vital to Carter and Beeman, with Oviatt's sewn watercolor collages one finds a welcomed historical texture and more of a delight in material and form. The artist isn't looking only at quilts, but also at Italian floor pavements, the subject of a recent show in the Chang Gallery.

In "Transformation: Cosmati," Oviatt uses an Italian pavement pattern as the structure for her ethereal watercolor fragments of fish, swirls and leaves. In many cases, the artist is recycling old paintings into the geometric scraps that make up the larger machine-sewn collages.

"I was in Italy the year I did this and was just amazed and dazzled by the floors," Oviatt said. "Many of the patterns I saw there were American quilt patterns."

Cosmati refers to the name of an Italian family that for decades dominated marble floor design in the great Roman Catholic cathedrals and temples of Italy. Oviatt's penchant for recycling also refers to the way the Cosmati family recycled materials from old buildings into its pavements.

Some might consider Oviatt a more serious artist than the other two in execution alone, but that's too easy. Although the rest of the art world might equate a sense of humor with fluff, Carter and Beeman prove otherwise.

As any comic will attest, humor is much more difficult than drama. As any local art patron surely will attest, buying humorous art is more difficult than buying safe landscapes. And that's no joke.

Parker leads Aggies from behind in 4th quarter, to win in 2nd overtime

By JOEL WHITE

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

ST. LOUIS — Although Texas A&M reeled off 15 consecutive points for a 27-27 tie in the fourth quarter of the Big 12 Championship game Saturday, the Wildcats' feeling of invincibility wouldn't die in overtime.

Not even when Aggies running back Sirr Parker dashed along the sideline and pulled Wildcats safety Lamar Chapman across the goal line in the second overtime did K-State wide receiver Darnell McDonald think that losing was a possibility.

"Right before he fell into the end zone, I don't think the whole team thought we were going to lose," McDonald said. "Even though he was running and about to score, we still thought that somehow we were going to pull through."

Parker caught the Brannan Stewart pass off of short slant route at the 32-yard line and raced to the end zone — ending the Wildcats' national-championship aspirations, 36-33.

Before Parker's double-overtime touchdown, the Wildcats appeared to be in position to force a third overtime.

On the Aggies' first play of the second overtime at the 25-yard line, trailing 33-30, Wildcats safety Jarrod Cooper and defensive end Joe Bob Clements tackled running back Dante Hall for a 2-yard loss. Then on third down, after an incompletion by Stewart and a false-start penalty that put the ball at 32, Stewart threw the game-winning pass.

"I didn't really think he got in while he was running," McDonald said. "I was like, 'OK, just tackle him. They'll have to kick a field goal.' But I saw him keep running, and when he got into the end zone, I just had to bow my head."

Offensively, the Wildcats' overtime offense stuck to the ground game and had to settle for field goals of 22 and 25 yards by Martin Gramatica.

"You know you've got to put the ball in the end zone," right guard Jeremy Martin said. "Kicking field goals, sooner or later you're going to lose."

"I was frustrated as far as the offense, as far as me being a part of it," Lockett said. "We've worked time and time again on getting the ball in inside the 20."

K-State linebacker said the overtime loss was a pain unlike any he had ever felt.

"I've had a lot of surgeries in my life," Ochs said, "and nothing has ever hurt like this before."

LOSS

In just 81 seconds, Stewart picked apart the K-State secondary, drawing blood on a 9-yard touchdown pass to tailback Sirr Parker that brought A&M within two. One play later, the two hooked up again to tie the game at 27 with 1:05 left.

K-State's overtime fate was sealed after Martin Gramatica's second field goal of the extra period was answered by Parker's touchdown catch.

While tears were shed and emotions sank low following the showdown, Snyder preached the need for togetherness after such a tremendous setback.

"The Lord tests us all in a lot of different ways, and this is a test," Snyder said. "This is probably the greatest test that they have had up to this point in time."

"It's painful now. It's going to be more painful later this evening. It's going to be more painful in the middle of the night, and tomorrow morning will be the most painful of all. And all of us just have to stand up and deal with that and then come together and care, just flat-out care."

UCLA's 49-45 loss to Miami meant victory would put Cats in national championship game

By FRANK FLATON

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

ST. LOUIS — It seemed everything was on K-State's fingertips in an emotional 36-33 double-overtime loss Saturday to Texas A&M in the Dr Pepper Big 12 Football Championship Game — even the chance to play in the national title game.

Miami's 49-45 victory over No. 3 UCLA was announced midway through the second quarter, so the Cats finally had an opportunity to leap from their third-place spot in the Bowl Championship Series rankings to grab a Tostitos Fiesta Bowl bid. Everything was in place, except a Wildcat victory.

"We had a lot of opportunities," senior linebacker Travis Ochs said. "We just slowly pissed the game away. When it comes down to it, we lost."

As K-State watched its dreams of playing for a national championship fade away, Wildcat faithful pondered the question — did UCLA's loss affect K-State's play?

"It didn't affect us at all," receiver Darnell McDonald said. "We played to keep the lead. They came back and knocked us off."

As the scoreboard flashed the UCLA score, K-State fans roared and players cheered. However, after McDonald's touchdown, the Cats allowed A&M to fight back to within eight points after an Aggie touchdown made the score 27-19.

From that point on, costly turnovers, penalties and missed opportunities decided the overtime outcome for the Wildcats.

Coach Bill Snyder, who often tells his players to focus on the task at hand and not look ahead to future games, said the UCLA-Miami game was more of a motivational tool than a distraction.

"It was a motivational lift for our players, not a letdown at all," Snyder said. "It was left in our hands. So many things be in the alliance bowl."

K-State, playing in their first-ever Alamo Bowl, are 0-2 all time against the Boilermakers, who finished fourth in the Big 10 Conference.

In a Sunday afternoon news release, Ernesto Ancira Jr., the 1998 Builders Square Alamo Bowl chairman, said he was proud to have K-State play in San Antonio.

"We are extremely excited about this year's matchup," Ancira said. "To be able to host the No. 4 team in the nation in Kansas State University is an unbelievable opportunity for us."

"This is a team that was in the hunt for college football's national championship and features one of the nation's best quarterbacks in Heisman Trophy candidate Michael Bishop."

Purdue finished 8-4 in 1998, 7-2 in conference play. The Boilermakers are led by senior quarterback and Big 10 Offensive Player of the Year Drew Brees.

Brees, who also was named a First Team All-Big 10 selection, passed for 3,753 yards and 36 touchdowns. On defense, senior defensive end Roosevelt Colvin, who tied the Purdue record with 13 sacks, also was a First Team All-Big 10 selection.

The Boilermakers rank first in the Big 10 in both passing and total offense, as Brees set two NCAA single-game records for pass completions and pass attempts against Wisconsin earlier this season.

Even after the disappointing Saturday for the Wildcats, Brown said the Alamo Bowl will be a game to watch.

"It's an honor to be invited to our sixth-straight bowl game," he said. "I think this game will be one of the most exciting games of the bowl period. When you put those two quarterbacks together, it could really be an offensive show."

Although Brown remained optimistic about the situation, Wefald said it was disappointing that K-State did not receive a BCS bowl bid.

"The BCS should have found a place for us in one of the alliance bowls," he said.

"We deserve to be in an alliance bowl, but I'm sure coaches, players and fans will look forward to the Alamo Bowl."

The Cats will play at 7:30 p.m. in San Antonio's 65,000-seat Alamodome. For ticket information, contact TicketMaster at (210) 224-9600.

1st-day bowl ticket sales down from previous years

By JENNIFER LUCKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics sold more than 2,000 tickets to the Alamo Bowl on Monday — fewer than previous years' totals on the first day after a bowl announcement.

Ticket Manager Carol Adolph said ticket sales are down somewhat but still are fairly strong.

"People haven't had time to make their travel arrangements," Adolph said. "A lot of them were planning on being off for New Year's, and this is a different day of the week. There are little crimps in all of that for people making arrangements."

K-State was allotted 11,000 of the Alamodome's 65,000 seats. K-State can obtain more tickets to the Dec. 29 game if the demand exists, Adolph said.

Tickets can be purchased from the Athletic Department Ticket Office for $33.50 or $40.50.

Adolph said the best tickets would go to donors.

"We don't have the tickets, so we don't know what price will get which location," Adolph said.

She said there is no way to predict the number of tickets the department will sell.

Tickets also can be purchased from Ticketmaster outlets and cost between $10 and $75. The Ticketmaster seats aren't counted in K-State's allotment, meaning more tickets actually are available for fans.

K-State fans are scrambling to change their bowl game plans and to purchase tickets for the football team's unexpected trip to San Antonio. The KSU Alumni Association is offering packages that will include tickets and lodging as well as a pregame party. Three different packages range in cost from $370 to $956.

The Purple Pride Deluxe tour is three nights in a hotel on the Riverwalk. It is offered as a land-air package, which includes transportation to San Antonio, or a land package only.

The Powercat Standard tour is three nights in a hotel about 20 minutes away. This tour also is available as land-air or land package only.

The Wildcat Economy tour is land only and includes two nights in a hotel.

The Alumni Association sold more than 400 packages Monday.

Karen Shafer, director of communications, said a lot of people call the first day to check prices and then call back later to purchase tickets.

"A lot of times ticket sales are lower the first day," Shafer said. She said she wasn't sure how the sales compared to last year's.

"It seemed like the phones were just as busy as last year," she said.

The Alumni Association sold more than 2,500 packages for the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl. Shafer said sales could reach the same numbers this year, as packages still could sell for a week-and-a-half or more.

Packages also can be purchased from local travel agencies; some offer the Alumni Association's package.

Creative Travel Inc. has had a fairly good demand for their packages, representative Kirk Wasinger said.

"Everyone has been a little disappointed, but they're supporting the team," Wasinger said. "They're backing them 100 percent on this bowl."

Another option is the package offered through Lucky BrewGrille. The four-day, three-night package includes breakfast, happy hour, parking, lodging and three parties for $110. The price is based on four people per room and goes on sale Tuesday.

The package does not include transportation or a ticket.

Lucky's owner Bob Leetch said he believed the demand for bowl tickets and packages will come a bit later this year.

"I think we'll sell a lot of packages," Leetch said. "Right now people are in shock."

"Unfortunately, we're not going to a great bowl. We're going to a good bowl. We're going to a good bowl and a good town. I think everyone will get excited again."

BIDDING WAR

Resident assistants auctioned to raise money for AIDS awareness

Moore Hall residents were shelling out the bucks last night in a resident assistant auction to raise money for AIDS awareness.

Monday night's event was only the first of programs that will take place throughout the week in promotion of AIDS awareness.

"There's more people than would admit it that have been touched by AIDS," Cyndi Mackey, junior in marketing, said. "This is to have fun and raise money for a serious cause."

Marty Grusznis, multicultural chair at Moore Hall and master of ceremonies, said residents were whooping and hollering as RAs "strutted their stuff" down a catwalk in order to be auctioned off.

Many residents collected money from others on their floors to buy RAs. All RAs promised to do a chore for the person or people that bought them. The chores ranged from a trip to Lawrence to bedtime stories with homemade cookies.

"We collected $13.10 from our floor," Cynthia Rohrbaugh, freshman in pre-veterinary medicine, said. "(The auction) is fun. It's not boring, it's not just here — donate for a good cause."

Rohrbaugh started the bidding for her RA at $13.10. However, she spent $35 total for Marni Fisher, senior in math and psychology. Fisher promised to make apple pancakes for everyone on her floor.

Mark Pfeil, junior in architecture, promised to vacuum all the rooms on the floor of the person who bought him.

Sara Simonet, freshman in psychology, bought him for $50.

"He's going to go Christmas shopping with me and carry all my bags," Simonet said.

The auction raised $838.55. The highest bid was $150 for Grusznis, freshman in business, and Kevin Wanklyn, president of Moore Hall and junior in mechanical engineering.

All proceeds that were raised in the auction will be given to the Regional AIDS Project in an effort to increase AIDS awareness in the Manhattan community and surrounding areas.

"The money will go to our educational programs," Eunice Dorst, executive director of the Project, said.

The Project gives free condoms and information to many local businesses like bars in Aggieville and other groups in the surrounding area. They also offer to speak with different groups in the community.

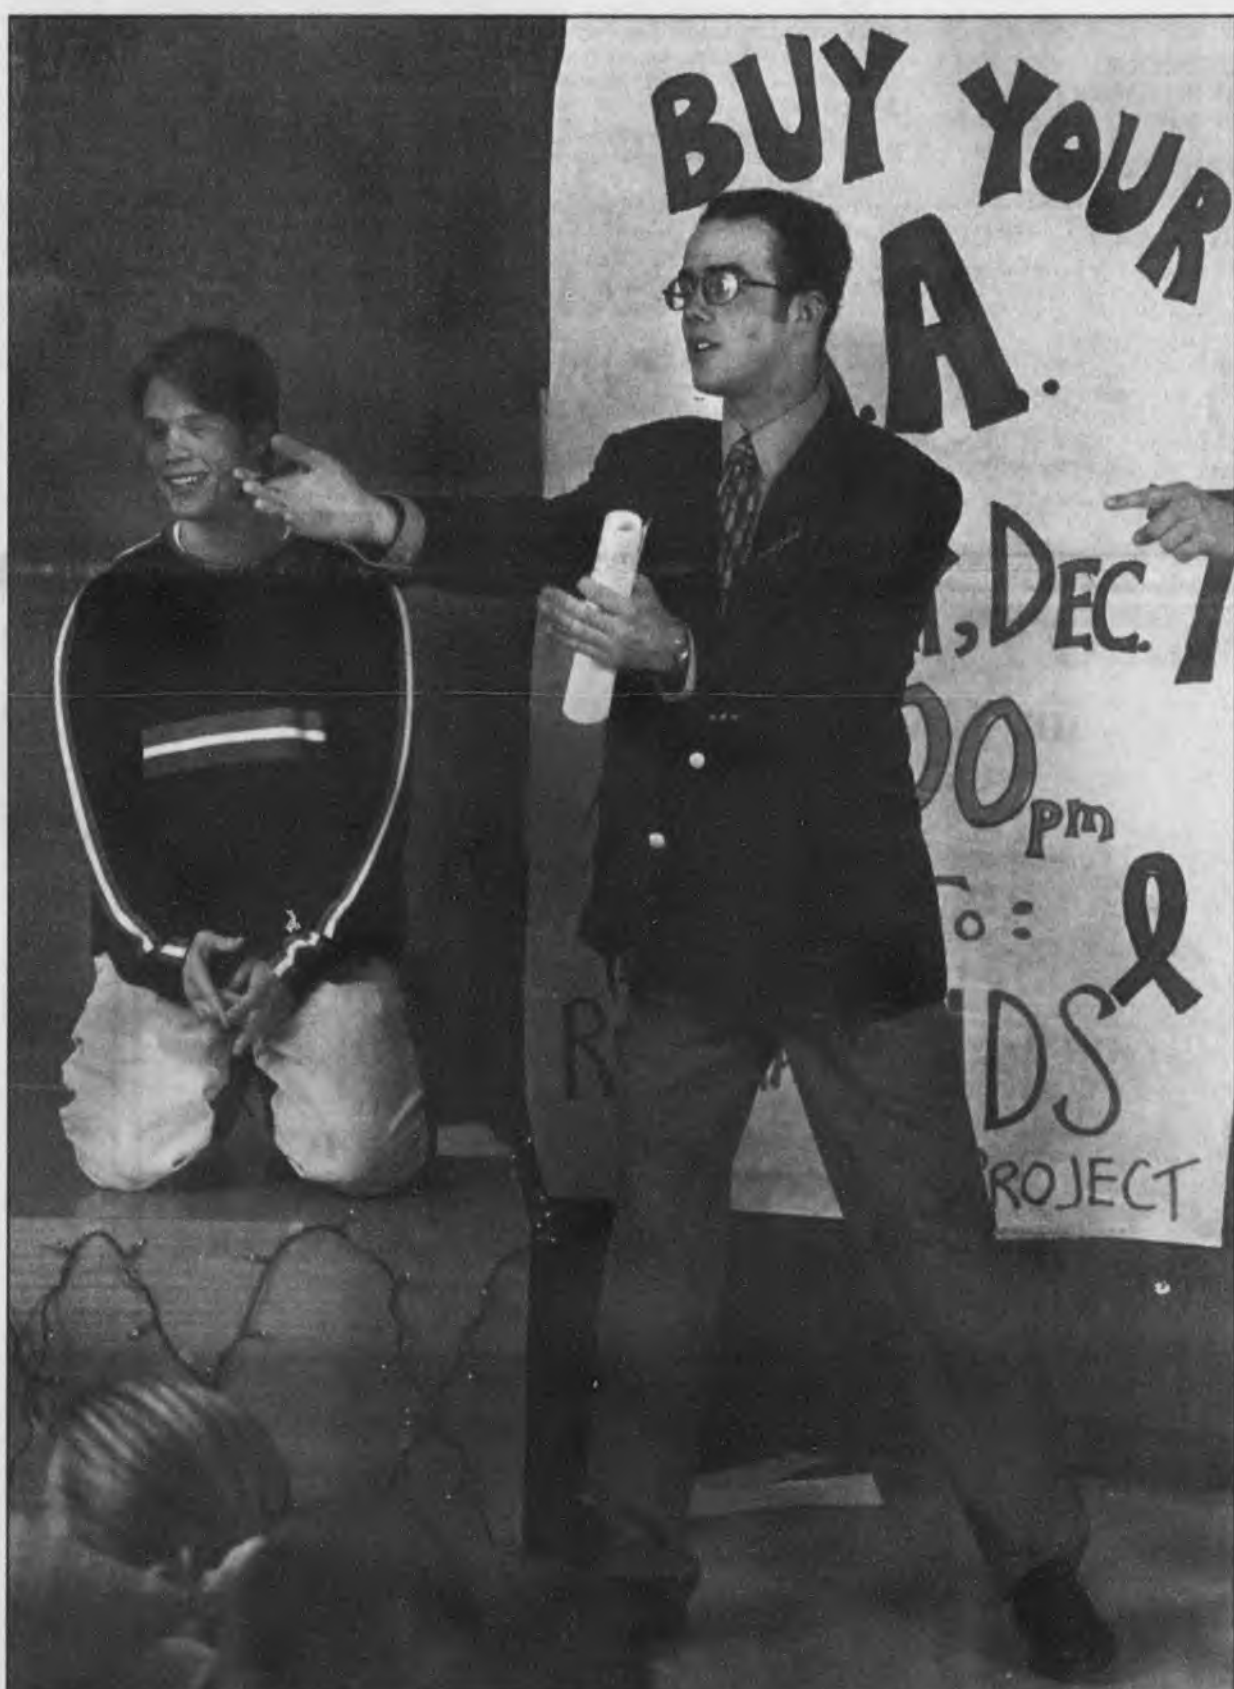

The AIDS Awareness week will include other activities this week.

Tuesday evening Moore Hall residents will be asked to participate in a community service project to benefit AIDS awareness. Mackey said notes about staying safe as well as condoms will be put into packets that will eventually be distributed to area bars through the Project.

Residents also have signed up to take three-hour shifts sitting in a chair tied to a pillar in the lobby on Tuesday. Mackey said the people sitting in the lobby are supposed to represent a person with AIDS. The shifts will last for 24 hours because people with AIDS always carry the disease with them — 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

"We're hoping it will create a visual effect for the residents," Mackey said. "They can come up to the person and ask them why they're sitting there, and that

Union ballroom renovations to be completed this month

By AMANDA LEVIN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The vision for an enhanced K-State Student Union is progressing into a reality.

"The renovation of the ballroom area is in its final stages and should be completed in the middle of December," Mike Mayo, head architect for Union renovation, said.

The ballroom will be divided into two rooms by a partition, Union director Bernard Pitts said. The partition is designed to reduce the transfer of noise between the rooms.

"It will now be much more convenient to use the ballroom for two activities at the same time," Pitts said.

After the ballroom is complete, the next area of renovation will be the Union Stateroom cafeteria.

"Students will see a significant change in the dining and food court area once they return for the spring semester," Mayo said.

During renovation, Stateroom seating will be moved into the hallway outside of the second-level textbook area and one-third of the way into the Union Bookstore.

The food area will remain in its

Trooper shoots, kills man during routine drug search

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SALINA, Kan. — A state trooper making a routine drug search on a Greyhound bus Monday shot and killed a passenger who pulled a gun and opened fire.

No one else on the bus was injured, said Highway Patrol Sgt. Derrick Hood.

About 20 people were on the bus, police said.

The shooting occurred at the Amoco Travel Plaza on the west side of Salina after the bus arrived en route from Denver to Kansas City, Mo.

Hood said the patrol and Greyhound have an agreement under which a drug-sniffing dog checks buses for contraband at the terminal while passengers are off the vehicle.

On Monday, Hood said, the dog indicated the presence of contraband in a carry-on bag. Troopers found a holster inside, but Hood said he did not know what else was found.

Passengers were allowed back on the bus and questioned, and one man admitted he owned the bag.

The man started to struggle and made a movement to his beltline, Hood said.

One of the officers grabbed the man, the suspect fired, and the second

Committee will research building skate park in city

By TIM RICHARDSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A committee will be formed by the Parks and Recreation Advisory Board to look into building a skate park in Manhattan.

Skaters from around the city expressed their support for the park at the board's meeting Monday night at Amanda Arnold Elementary School. A conceptual plan and a projected price likely will be presented to board members at their January or February meeting.

"Any time we have the opportunity to provide for the youth in our community, I think we should do it," board member Terry DeWeese said.

Though the project is still in early stages, he estimated it might cost from $50,000 to $120,000. It could be used by skateboarders and in-line skaters.

K-State services open during winter break

With the end of the semester approaching fast, many students are anticipating the end of classes and returning home for the holidays.

However, for those students still in town, campus computer labs, Lafene Health Center and Hale Library still have convenient hours available.

Rob Satterlee, computer information specialist for Computer and Network Services, said all computer labs are open 24 hours a day throughout winter break. The only reason labs would close is for custodial maintenance or for a new software release.

"A lot of international students are around during the break as well as students who don't have the opportunity to go home because of the distance," Satterlee said.

Satterlee said the only closing scheduled at this time is for Nichols 21 on Dec. 16-18 for repainting.

Computers also will be updated with new software during winter break. Satterlee said each lab will be closed for about two hours, one at a time.

Karen McCulloh, assistant to the dean for Hale, said more people use the library over winter break than one might think.

"If you consider that one-fourth of the student population is non-traditional and that there are graduate students and professors still on campus, it's not that empty," McCulloh said.

Library hours are as follows:

■ Closed Dec. 19 and 20
■ Open 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Dec. 21-24
■ Closed Dec. 25-27
■ Open 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Dec. 28-31
■ Closed Jan. 1
■ Open 1 to 5 p.m. Jan. 2
■ Open 8 a.m. to 8 p.m. Jan. 4-8
■ Open 1 to 5 p.m. Jan. 9
■ Open 8 a.m. to 8 p.m. Jan. 11-13
■ Regular hours beginning Jan. 14
Lafene will be closed Dec. 25 and 26 and Jan. 1 and 2. During the rest of winter break, the hours will be 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday-Friday and 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. on Saturdays.

Victory signs illegal outside of city limits

K-State might get a sign honoring last year's Tostitos Fiesta Bowl win after construction on Interstate 70 is completed near Manhattan exits.

Signs commending the university's debate and livestock judging teams are located at exits 303 and 313 on I-70. The signs, however, are against Kansas Department of Transportation regulations.

Rules allow signs honoring national champions to be located inside titleholders' city limits. A Fiesta Bowl sign also would be against KDOT regulations, even if it were placed inside city limits. A sign within the city limits only can be made to commend a group if it wins a national title through an organized competition.

Another KDOT regulation allows only one sign to be up at a time.

The existing signs have expired. Previous regulations allowed only one sign to be up at a time for a minimum of one year and a maximum of two.

When a new sign is put up, the old sign must be taken down.

Dale Hershberger, KDOT area engineer in Clay Center, Kan., said if a football sign were added, the existing signs probably would be removed.

One KDOT official said he doesn't think any signs commending accomplishments should be on the interstate.

"They should not be out where they are affecting the motoring public," said Lee Roadifer, KDOT senior traffic signing engineer in Topeka. "Championships have nothing to do with that and should not be on the highway.

"It's a nice honor, but it's not the national title," he said.

The debate and livestock signs were added to the Manhattan I-70 exits at the university's request.

Roadifer said the existing signs would not be up if he had made the decision.

"It was not my doing. That's all I can say," he said. "It wouldn't be up if I had my way."

Republicans choose Glasscock as leader

TOPEKA — House Republicans picked Manhattan's Kent Glasscock as their majority leader by three votes Monday when they met to decide leadership positions for the 1999 legislative session.

Republicans picked Glasscock over Phill Kline of Shawnee for majority leader. The leader controls the flow of legislation and debate in the chamber.

The vote for Glasscock was 40-37 — one more than the minimum needed.

"The dominant mood of the caucus is one of working together," Glasscock said. "I don't anticipate a lot of division."

Some viewed the majority leader's race as moderate vs. conservative. Glasscock, a moderate, is married to Gov. Bill Graves' chief of staff. Kline turned his back on Graves during the GOP primary, supporting conservative challenger David Miller.

Robin Jennison, of Healy, received 41 votes for House speaker, defeating Speaker Pro Tem Susan Wagle of Wichita. Jennison, majority leader for the past two years, said his first priority as the new speaker will be to unite the majority Republicans in the chamber.

"We need to unify the Republican caucus and move forward with an agenda we can agree on," Jennison said after the vote. "We need to try to bring the party together, geographically and philosophically."

When the Legislature convenes Jan. 11, all Republicans are pledged to support Jennison, whose selection must be ratified by the entire 125-member House, which is expected to happen.

Panel wants evidence in president's defense

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Backpedaling under pressure, the White House jettisoned plans for a fresh assault on Kenneth Starr on Monday as it readied a last-ditch impeachment defense of President Clinton for the House Judiciary Committee.

The White House recast its strategy on the eve of historic hearings as the panel's chairman, Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., said there was a "compelling case" for impeaching the nation's 42nd president.

"I haven't heard anybody say Monica Lewinsky is a liar," the Illinois Republican said of the former White House intern whose detailed allegations of sexual encounters with the president are at the core of the nation's impeachment drama. Hyde challenged the White House to present exculpatory evidence over the two days allotted for the president's defense.

With the committee expected to vote by week's end on articles of impeachment related to perjury, obstruction of justice and abuse of power, Clinton's defenders increasingly were turning their attention to a likely battle in the full House next week.

The White House has been given a list of about 30 GOP lawmakers who officials believe could be persuaded to oppose impeachment, either on the merits of the case or on the basis of the political makeup of their districts, according to sources who are familiar with the situation and spoke only on condition of anonymity.

Clinton's campaign complied with laws

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Attorney General Janet Reno declined Monday to order an independent counsel investigation of President Clinton over 1996 campaign financing. She said there was clear and convincing evidence that he and Vice President Al Gore lacked criminal intent to violate federal spending limits.

Following a 90-day preliminary investigation, Reno advised a special court there were not reasonable grounds to believe further investigation was warranted.

ranted into the involvement of Clinton and Gore in Democratic Party-financed issue advertisements run during the 1996 election.

"I find by clear and convincing evidence a lack of knowing and willful criminal intent required for criminal prosecution," Reno wrote. She based this on the fact that Clinton and Gore were advised by legal counsel that the advertising campaign complied with the law.

"As we have said all along, the president and the Clinton-Gore campaign complied with the spirit and the letter of the law," said Amy Weiss, deputy White House press secretary. "We are gratified by this decision."

Students need to plan ahead for graduation

By NANCY GRATHWOHL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For most December graduates, this time of year can be hectic.

Graduates who plan to "walk" need to make sure they are prepared, said Elizabeth Unger, vice provost for academic services and technology. Graduates need their caps and gowns, announcements, detailed instructions and the graduation checks from their colleges. They also need to make arrangements for special services beforehand.

"If they have an individual in their party who is disabled, they should make arrangements with the appropriate facilities," Unger said.

Graduation should be a fun experience, Unger said.

"Commencement tends to be a very enjoyable ceremony, as each graduate is recognized individually," she said.

The graduation will be taped for later television broadcasting.

"We are televising some of the ceremonies for people who are ill or are not very mobile," Unger said.

Ceremonies for the Graduate School and the colleges of Arts and Sciences and Education will be shown at 7 p.m.

Dec. 17 on cable channel 19. At 7 p.m. on channel 19 the next day, the ceremonies for the colleges of Business Administration, Engineering and Agriculture also will be available for viewing.

Along with graduation ceremonies, the K-State Student Union will have a commencement buffet from 11 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. Dec. 12 in the South Stateroom.

"It is a very special day for anyone graduating, and a lot of times, the restaurants are full," said Cindie Snyder, Union marketing and promotions manager.

The menu will include roast beef, baked chicken, vegetarian lasagna, and an assortment of salads, vegetables and desserts.

"It is a nice, very fancy buffet in a private setting," Snyder said. "The people who benefit most are students with relatives coming in. It allows them to see some of the campus."

Reservations for the meal are not required, but they are appreciated for groups larger than eight, Snyder said. The buffet costs $9.95 for adults, $5.95 for children under 10, and is free for children under 4.

Kansas Gas Service encourages you to use your common senses.

Smell
something rotten
in the house?

It may not be the garbage. If you smell something like rotten eggs, you may have a natural gas leak in your home. While natural gas is naturally colorless, odorless, and safe, we've added an unnatural scent to warn you of a gas presence in your home. If you think you might have a natural gas leak:

Leave the house immediately and call Kansas Gas Service from a neighbor's phone. Don't flip a light switch, light a match or use your telephone, any of which can create a spark that can result in a fire.

Feel frequent headaches...
dizziness or nausea?

It may be the air you're breathing. If you experience frequent headaches, dizziness, fatigue, excessive perspiration or nausea, you may be suffering symptoms of carbon monoxide poisoning, the result of improper combustion in your gas furnace.

Leave the house immediately. Call 911 from a neighbor's home and your local fire department will be there to test for carbon monoxide levels in your home.

See yellow instead of a blue furnace flame?

It may be a warning sign. Check all your gas appliances regularly to make certain the burner flame is blue. A yellow flame is a sign that your gas fuel is burning inefficiently - that means an increased potential for carbon monoxide poisoning and higher fuel bills.

Ask a qualified heating and cooling contractor to inspect your gas furnace annually. Don't block air intake areas around appliances. Clean or replace heating system air filters regularly. Check flue and chimney for proper ventilation. Don't block air intake areas near appliances.

Call 1-800-DIG-SAFE before you dig.

Each day Kansas Gas Service delivers natural gas to heat homes, cook food, cool commercial buildings and more through a series of underground gas lines. If you plan to dig around your home, please call us at least two days in advance and our trained personnel will mark your lines at no charge to you.

OUR VIEW

Construction efficient in Union renovations

We complain about a lot of stuff on this campus. It just always seems like the university is out to make everything inconvenient for us.

But we'd like to take this opportunity to thank everyone involved with the K-State Student Union enhancement effort for making every attempt to stay out of our hair.

The construction is progressing as planned, and the Ballroom renovation will be complete in a few weeks.

Up to this point, the construction has caused little, if any, inconvenience for students. Sure, we don't have real knives to cut chicken tenders with anymore, and we might have to use a different door than we're used to for a few days, but it's a small price to pay.

Construction has been out of our way, and it's been relatively quiet, considering.

The true test of the accommodations to students (and students' good attitudes) will come when renovations to the Union Stateroom begin. Food service will remain in the current food court while the new one is built. Tables will be moved to the hallway outside the Stateroom and one-third of the way into Union Bookstore.

It might seem a little cramped at first, but consider the alternatives.

We could be stuck with no food service in the Union for a while. Subway and Sbarro are fine, but who wants to eat there every day?

We could have no place to sit down, relax and eat.

The tables and chairs might clutter the area for a short while, but just remember to say "excuse me" a few more times.

Students, we must be aware of what is occurring around us during this construction. Realize the changes really are all for the better.

A little congestion in the hallway near the bookstore might seem like a pain for a while, but just remember what it will bring in the future.

Our Union will be a better place.

READERS WRITE

Time to focus on other areas at K-State after football loss

Editor,

It is commendable that K-State has come such a long way — from a football program with the worst record in Division IA to a top-ranked team and national championship contender. Obviously, it took considerable effort on the part of all involved to reach this summit.

It is a good example of how a goal can be achieved once the powers that be focus on it. However, as we recover from the collective hangover, I suggest it is time to focus on some of the other necessities of being a reputable university. Although we are "No. 1" in football, we are not even close to being top-ranked in a number of, arguably, more important arenas.

According to the National Research Council, the research arm of the National Academy of Sciences, K-State was placed, on average, in the bottom 29 percent for 17 different academic programs. Our library resources consistently are ranked among the worst in the nation. And so it goes.

It takes more than a good football team to make a great university. Perhaps we now can start putting the same effort into improving our academic reputation as we did into becoming the top-ranked team in college football.

Fan wants to buy goal post

Editor,

In response to the article in the paper about how the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics took the goal post back, I have a suggestion.

Sources said they were planning to break down the remaining pieces after they study the post and give it to the players. I feel that this isn't exactly fair to the fans who brought it down in the first place. I mean, if it wasn't for the fans, the post still would be standing at KSU Stadium. I feel that the fans have a right to have a piece of the post as well as the players. My idea is to start a collection of money in order to buy part of the post from the athletic department so it isn't considered stealing anymore.

After we buy the right to have a part, we put the date and score on it, encase it and put it inside Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon, since that's where the students wanted it in the first place. I plan on talking to Rusty Wilson to see if he will back me up on this idea and to see where we can go from there. Any support would be much appreciated.

AARON FRUEHLING

'PSYCHO'

Remake of 1960 Hitchcock classic leaves columnist asking 'why?'

American moviegoers must have been naughty this season, because Gus Van Santa Claus has left a lump of coal in their stockings.

The lump in question is the remake of "Psycho," Alfred Hitchcock's 1960 pulpy masterpiece. This version, though, is not like any other remake we've seen. Director Gus Van Sant used Hitchcock's original shooting script, which means nearly every line and camera angle is the same as those in the original.

What, then, is the purpose of retelling the story, you might ask. If all the technical elements are basically the same, what is left to improve?

Not a damn thing. Hitch got it right the first time. For 38 years, "Psycho" has been the yardstick by which all scary movies are measured. This is a film so powerful, it changed the way people bathed themselves. Constructed as a low-budget slasher flick, it was the first real study of a psychopath the movies ever offered.

It was daringly controversial because it featured Janet Leigh wearing only a bra. Braver still was Hitchcock's choice to film Hollywood's first flushing toilet. Here was the story of a grade-A sex pervert, a kind of hero with which America was unfamiliar at the time. Miraculously, Hitchcock managed to tell the entire tawdry story and still stay within the industry's regulations.

Van Sant, however, has chosen a different route. Rather than using Hitchcock's blueprints, he gives us Viggo Mortensen and Anne Heche's naked bodies in the first scene of the film. Instead of simply allowing Vince Vaughn to watch Heche undress through a hole in the wall, we are provided with the sounds of him gratifying himself. Norman Bates' boyhood nursery now has trashy pornography lying about.

Offensive? Sure, but not nearly as much as the performances. It's hard to screw up actors as good as Vaughn, Heche, Julianne Moore, William H. Macy and Robert Forster, but Van Sant has proven himself a wunderkind. The acting is downright ridiculous. Perhaps it is because the performers are forced to deal with a script that has grown a bit creaky since 1960. Maybe it's because a story like this should only exist in black and white (the colors in this movie are outrageous). Or maybe it can be chalked up to the actors knowing exactly how obscene the movie was going to be.

Bernard Herrmann's great original score is used again here, but more than it is needed. Even the opening credits are identical to the original. What's more, they've managed to make a terrifying story tedious and boring. Don't be fooled. Now is the time to be a purist and rent the 1960 version.

Creativity seems to be in dangerously short supply right now. We have two computer-animated movies that take place in ant colonies and tell the stories of underdog insects. In addition to "Psycho," a remake of Hitchcock's "Rear Window" recently aired on ABC. The best movies this season have been "The Wizard of Oz" and the re-edited version of "Touch of Evil." Fresh ideas are like fossil fuels, and we're running out fast.

Do not see this movie. Hollywood cannot be allowed to think reproducing classics in the form of crap is an acceptable money-making endeavor.

Do not see this movie. Hollywood cannot be allowed to think that reproducing classics in the form of crap is an acceptable money-making endeavor.

The final shot of Hitchcock's movie is of a car containing a body being pulled out of a lake. Rather than letting it end there, Van Sant allows the camera to linger on the scene during the final credits. Just when you think, "How appropriate to focus on a corpse when they've just killed one of Hollywood's greatest legends," you will see the final credit: "In memory of Alfred Hitchcock."

Hardly. After "Good Will Hunting," Van Sant finally is a hot Hollywood commodity. All he really needs, however, is a cold shower, Bates Motel-style.

Museum attendant now looks at things differently

There's a painting in the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art that changes every time I go in for work. The picture's seemingly simple facade never changes, but my perception of it changes with my ever-changing moods. Many patrons of the museum scoff at it and say something like, "I could have done that" or, "This really is pointless," but I'm drawn to it simply because of how it makes me feel.

I've been noticing perceptions a lot this semester.

My main duty as a gallery attendant is to walk around the galleries and make sure the art is protected from fingers and backpacks. All this sneaking around gives me lots of time to check everything out and take in all the art.

It's interesting to notice how, on a bright day, the art is awesome to me. Fire isn't destruction; it's life. Prints speaking of oppression scream the wonderful rights of freedom of expression and creativity. My beloved "Untitled" painting is light eating away at the night, reconstruction and modification.

On a bad day, everything gets darker. Sunrises are perceived as sunsets, oppression is oppression, a man lying on the ground is dead rather than asleep, and my picture leaves me feeling empty and alone.

I noticed over Thanksgiving break how much my perceptions of home also have changed over the last few years. Home used to be a prison where I dreamed of climbing a bell tower with a big gun.

Then I moved away, and it became the dreaded country I came back to, only to see my family and a place in which I was forced to stay until my scholarship hall opened its doors again.

Last year, I opened up to southeast Kansas a bit more when I became able to come and go as pleased — kinda like Canada or a 24-hour convenience store.

Now, visiting southeast Kansas is like doing a cultural study on a place I was not a part of. It's a place that shows me how much I've grown and changed, and it's a place that really interests me. I love to just go and take it all in — the people, the topics of conversation, the beliefs, the few billboard signs, small town cafes and the people who frequent them, and the fact that in the middle of town I can see all of Orion's stars and in the country the sky becomes overwhelming. Now I love my old home more than I did when I lived there.

This semester, I've had the wonderful opportunity to hear how K-State students perceive my writing and myself. At the museum, I always have to guess how people perceive the art, but this semester I experienced the perceptions of others firsthand.

I really enjoyed it. Opinions and perceptions make us unique, and the ways in which people express them are unique as well.

Perception is all about response. For me, the key issue in this concept is that even though we're responding to something that either remains constant or changes, we are always able to let our perceptions evolve. A change in perception is not always a negative change in yourself. My changing perceptions have helped me grow.

Being able to look at a painting and feel different about it every day helps me understand and appreciate it more.

Being able to stand back and view southeast Kansas as a unique, interesting place rather than a prison has led me to a greater appreciation of the area I grew up in and a greater understanding of how it has nurtured my self.

Being able to hear the perceptions others have of my beliefs and myself led me to a better understanding of their beliefs, and even though many have negative perceptions of me because of my beliefs, I feel closer to all who shared their views with me.

I hope you enjoyed the semester as much as I did. Have a wonderful winter break with your friends, families, pets, and various beliefs and traditions.

Men's basketball team prepares for Wichita State Shockers

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coming off an 80-52 drubbing of Loyola of Chicago, the Wildcats return to battle against intrastate rival Wichita State at 7 tonight at Bramlage Coliseum.

The Cats are 6-2 going into the contest, with their only setbacks coming against No. 11 Indiana and No. 19 Clemson in the Maui Invitational.

Playing several games nearly back-to-back earlier this season, the Cats finally had a week to prepare for a foe.

"The one thing we have been able to do after the Loyola game is to practice a lot and to grow and improve as a team," assistant coach Mark Fox said. "As long as we continue to do that, we will have a solid year."

Leading the way for the Cats so far this season are junior college transfers Tony Kitt and Cortez Groves, who are averaging 13.3 and 11.9 points a game, respectively.

Kitt, a junior power forward, also has pulled down an average of 10.3 rebounds a game. Senior guard Josh Reid has averaged 11.3 points per game.

At 2-3, the Shockers are second to last in the Missouri Valley standings. Offensively, Wichita State's tandem of sophomore Maurice Evans and junior Jason Perez pour in more than 40 points a game.

Evans, a member of the 1997-98 Missouri Valley Conference All-Newcomer team, has averaged 23.8 points a game. Perez, an Honorable Mention All-Missouri Valley Conference selection last season, has compiled 17.6 points and 5.2 rebounds per game.

With Perez and Evans carrying the scoring burden for the Shockers, Fox said stopping them will be crucial in tonight's matchup.

"They're both terrific players who are having terrific seasons," he said. "We will try several gameplans to contain them. Finding a way to contain them will be a huge key to the game."

Forced to play without starting power forward Darrin Williams for two games, the Shockers have experimented with several line-ups over the course of the season. Without Williams, Wichita State plays with a smaller front court.

"They have a couple of different line-ups they can play with," Fox said. "but with their depth, they can find a line-up that matches well."

Wichita State enters this season coming off back-to-back winning seasons, a milestone it hasn't accomplished since the 1987-88 and 1988-89 seasons.

Last season, the Wildcats squeaked past the Shockers 90-83 in overtime on Dec. 6 at Wichita. Senior guard Ayome May hit a 10-foot jumper with seven seconds left on the clock to send the game into overtime, where the Cats eventually took a commanding lead. Wichita native Manny Dies tossed in 25 points in the victory. Evans led the Shockers with 23 points, and Perez added 15.

Fox said the intrastate rivalry against Wichita State is a strong basketball tradition for fans.

"I think it's a game that develops a lot of enthusiasm," he said.

"It's a healthy rivalry, and we're looking forward to it."

K-State is 17-9 against the Shockers in the 26-year history of the rivalry.

AP names Williams top player

■ K-State's Bishop places distant 2nd to Texas back.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Ricky Williams returned for his final year at Texas with modest goals — win games and have fun.

Mission accomplished, and he still gets to play in the Cotton Bowl.

On Monday, Williams won The Associated Press' first College Player of the Year Award in balloting by AP member newspapers, TV and radio stations.

"Anytime you are considered the best it's flattering," Williams said, "and to be picked the top player in college football by the reporters who watch the games so closely is truly an honor."

Williams provided college football fans with an extra special season. While running for 2,214 yards and 27 touchdowns — he also had a TD reception — Williams became major college football's career rushing leader and carried his team to an 8-3 record and a Cotton Bowl matchup against Mississippi State on Jan. 1.

Williams received 76 of the 143 votes in the AP balloting, easily outdistancing K-State quarterback Michael Bishop, who had 17 votes. Kentucky quarterback Tim Couch was third with 15 votes.

On Saturday, Williams will be the overwhelming favorite to win the Heisman Trophy, given each year to college football's most outstanding player.

Williams owns 15 other NCAA records, including most career touchdowns.

Records don't matter much to Williams. Helping his team turn into a winner again under a new coach was the reason he returned to Austin instead of bolting to the NFL.

"I think the thing that excites me the most about winning an award like this is the fact that people are giving me credit for having an impact on my team," Williams said. "That's what has always been the most important thing to me, helping the team win games."

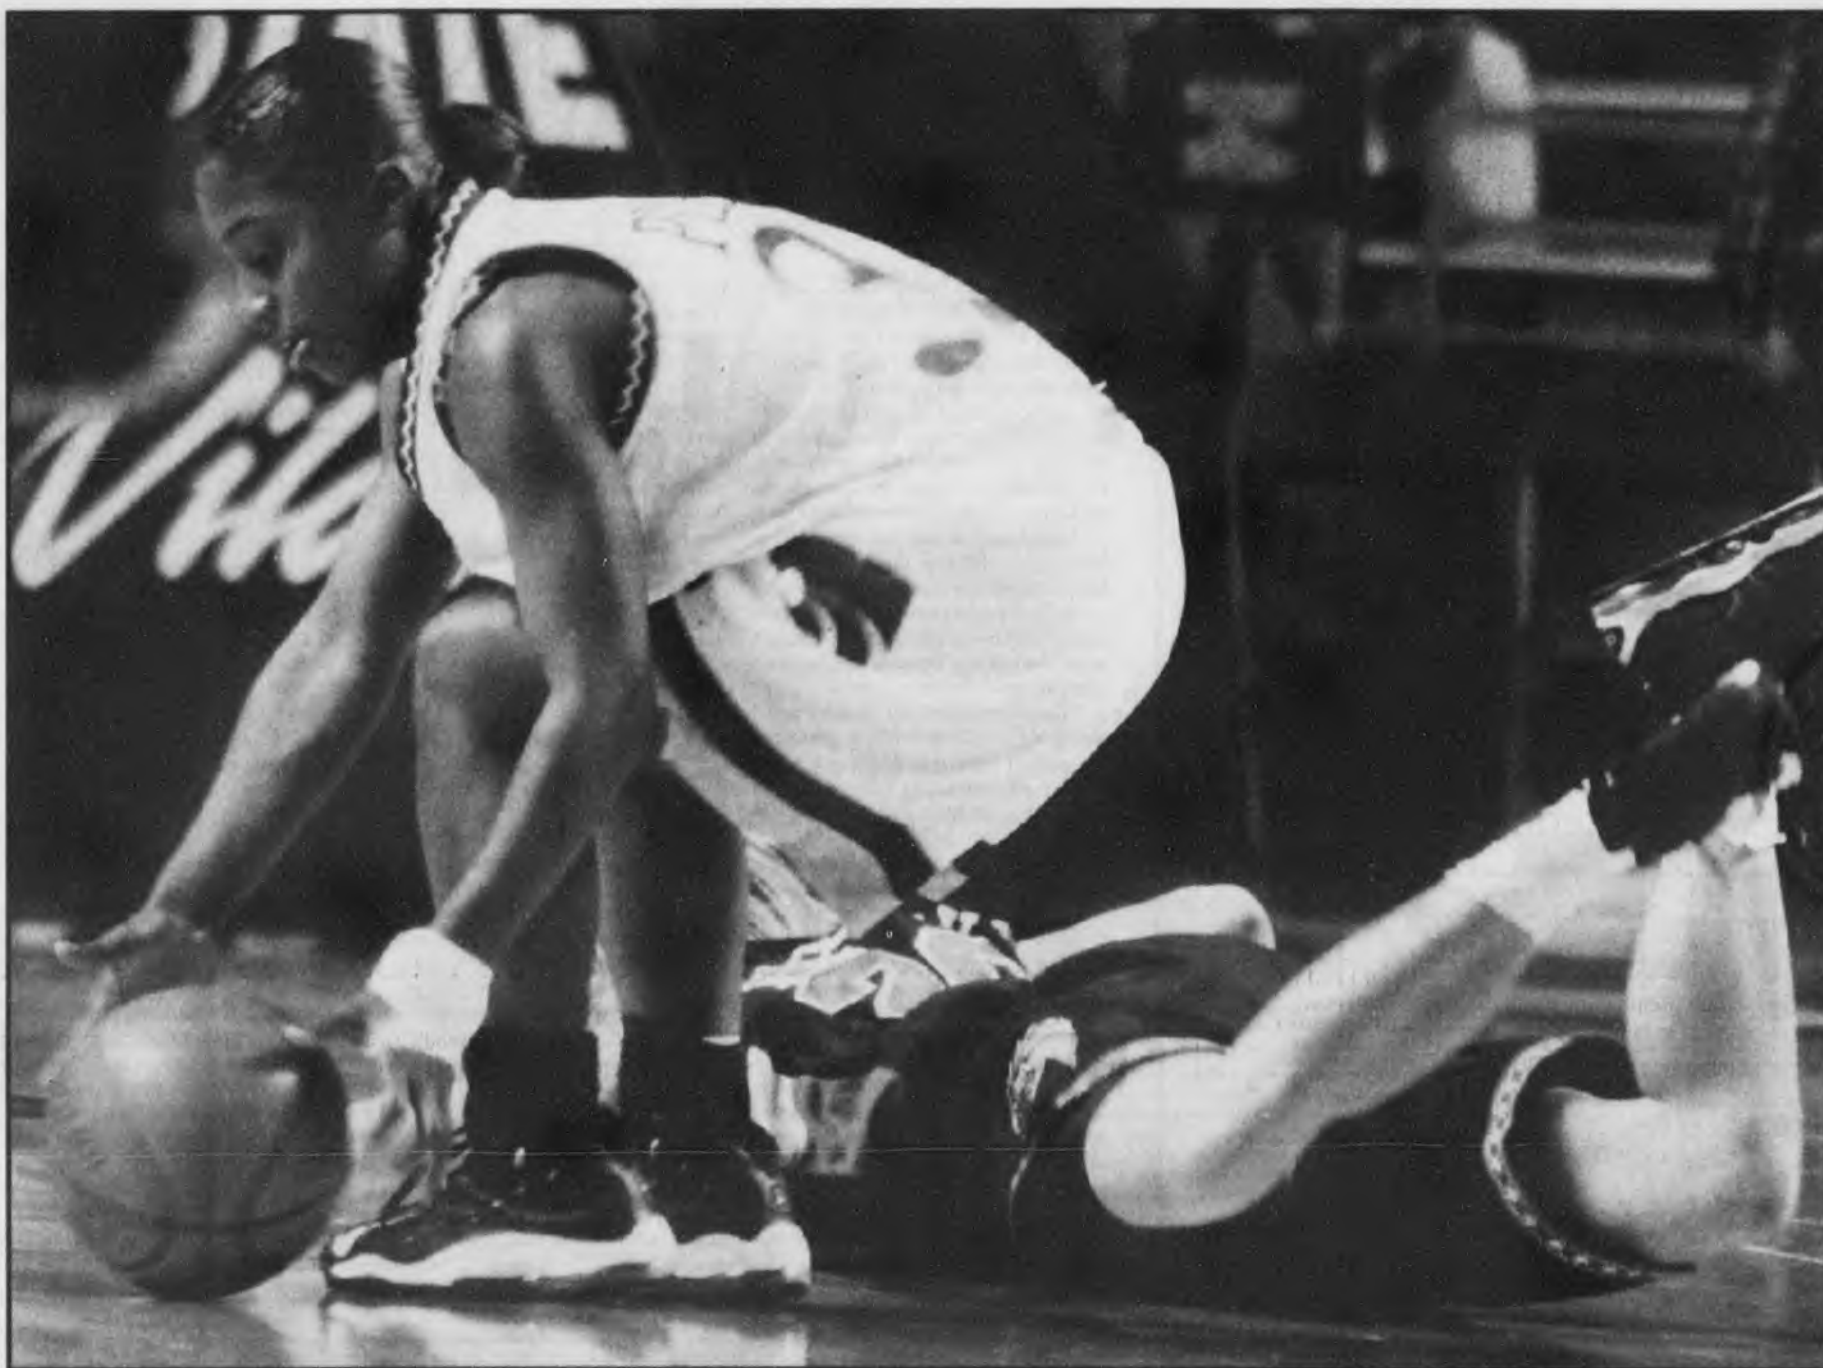

UCLA quarterback Cade McNown was fourth in the voting, followed by North Carolina State wide receiver Torry Holt, Ohio State quarterback Joe Germaine, Central Florida quarterback Daunte Culpepper, Wisconsin running back Ron Dayne, Louisiana Tech wide receiver Troy Edwards and Florida State wide receiver Peter Warrick.

■ K-State women's team defeats San Diego State to take championship.

While most K-State fans and players spent the weekend trying to cope with the football team's loss, the women's basketball team came out on the positive end with a championship in the Commerce Bank Wildcat Classic this past weekend at Bramlage Coliseum.

In the Classic's first-round game, K-State defeated Army, 87-58.

Against Army, the Cats were led in scoring by junior forward Nicky Ramage, who finished with 20 points. Junior center Angie Finkes added 17 points.

With the game's outcome decided early, head coach Deb Patterson was able to rest freshman point guard Essence Perry, who is recuperating from a broken hand.

"I think I'm getting back to where I had been before I broke my hand," Perry said.

"I'm feeling more comfortable."

With the first-round game behind them, the Cats advanced to the championship game to face San Diego State, which advanced after beating Detroit 78-59 in the other first-round game.

The Cats jumped out to an early lead with a 9-point run and a 22-2 stretch in the game's first eight minutes. The early domination, combined with the Aztecs' 24-percent shooting left K-State with a 35-15 halftime lead.

A strong second half led to a 77-56 K-State victory, giving the program its third tournament title in the tournament's four years of existence.

Ramage led the Cats again with her second career double double, scoring 20 points and pulling down 13 rebounds. Forward Brandi Harris chipped in 19 points. Perry finished with a career-high 10 points.

Patterson said Ramage's performance in the game was encouraging, and said she felt Ramage and Finkes were beginning to establish a low-post presence.

"It is a real positive to see two post players scoring in double figures," Patterson said. "Finkes is a very intelligent player, and she continues to progress."

In the second half of the game against SDSU, Patterson said the team let up on defensive intensity.

"I thought we had a real solid first half," Patterson said.

"We need to continue to challenge ourselves to play 40 minutes together," Patterson said.

During the tournament, K-State was led by Harris, who scored 33 points during the tournament. With this performance, Harris was named the tournament's Most Valuable Player and was selected to the All-Tournament team, along with Finkes and Ramage.

Patterson said Harris' main contribution to the team has been her solid play throughout the season.

"The big thing with her in the last three games has been her consistency," Patterson said.

With seven games in the books for the team, Patterson said the Cats were still trying to find their rhythm.

"I think we're still trying to find our identity, and we'll get there," Patterson said.

"We need to take each day and improve."

The Cats' season continues Wednesday with a 7 p.m. showdown with Kent State at Bramlage.

No matter how bleak forecast looks after loss, K-State's purple reign still far from over

FLATON

I don't mean to sound like an egotistical pig-dog, but I consider myself a manly guy. I enjoy flipping through a Sports Illustrated swimsuit edition, eating a nice bloody steak, and I definitely don't think I could live without my weekly trips to Japan to participate in sumo wrestling tournaments.

Despite all this manliness oozing from my every pore, on Nov. 14 (I think something really important happened on that day) I found myself on the verge of tears. Yes, after watching perhaps one of the most beautiful games in the history of sports, the manliest man I know (me) almost cried.

After a month of watching boxing and eating chicken fried steak to make up for this, I did it again. On Saturday, perhaps one of the bleakest days in K-State football history, I had to hold back my extreme disgust and just downright sorrow. I'm sure I wasn't alone.

Looking back on these two historical games, one question keeps popping into my head: How can K-State go from having perhaps the happiest moment in university history to being reduced to utter disappointment after a double-overtime, heart-breaking loss to Texas A&M?

Just a month ago, Manhattan was happier than Disneyland, and now it's as if this Kansas town has had its heart ripped out.

Players sobbed, coaches kept back tears and fans contemplated vandalism. Where did it all go wrong?

Let me turn to my life's teacher, cable television, for the explanation of these woes.

Right now, it's as if the entire Wildcat world is trapped inside a made-for-TV special on Lifetime. K-State is like the lead character who just lost his job, his wife and his dog, and then he was sent to prison (Alamo Bowl) for something he didn't do.

But realistically, maybe we're looking at this whole situation in a negative light. I don't mean to sugar coat a horrible situation, but we just need to turn the channel.

Let's grab our remote control of life that we call a brain and switch to a giddy episode of Happy Days or a Bob Ross painting special.

I know we might have been gyped in the bowl situation, but we can't let that disappointment ruin an otherwise beautiful season.

Put the Aggies aside for a moment and realize that we beat a dynasty this year. We shot down a 30-year losing streak against Nebraska, arguably one of the best football programs ever.

We were ranked No. 1 in the Coaches' Poll for more than a month.

I know it hurts, but we were one win away from the national championship game. Most teams only can dream of that. Bill Snyder was Big 12 Conference Coach of the Year.

Michael Bishop is a Heisman candidate, and we have numerous other players making the All-Big 12 team.

Despite the downfalls, that really is what is beautiful about college football. At one point, life is going well, and then the next minute it seems meaningless.

This emotional season is what sports are all about.

Intensity. Disappointment. Happiness. Excitement.

It can make children cheer and grown men cry. It might suck at this point, but if we step back and look at the situation, it's beautiful.

I hate to bring up the old sports adage, "You win some; you lose some," but it fits K-State's situation now more than ever. The great teams will rise from the ashes of disappointment and bounce back to be better than ever. These Wildcats will do just that.

Regardless of what happened Saturday, we still have a great football team, and more memories are still to come. If all goes well, in a couple of years, this week will be something at which we can laugh.

The purple storm might feel like a drizzle, but actually, it's stronger than ever. On Dec. 29 and in the future, our opponents had better wear rain coats. We might be down, but by all means, we're definitely not out.

BANKING OPTIONS FOR BUSY STUDENTS

By M.A. LOROFF
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's that time of year when money is especially tight for students.

At this moment, several are wondering if their paychecks have made it to the bank by the grace of the postal service in time to cover the hot checks which paid for Christmas presents.

Many students said they still bank at home simply because that is where their banks always have been.

Kelly Nguyen, senior in apparel and textile marketing, still does her banking in her hometown, but said she finds it's often an inconvenience.

"Recently, it was my birthday and I was given checks as birthday presents," she said. "I wanted to divide one check into savings, checking and get cash. I had to drive an hour and a half for one check."

Nguyen said it would be easier to get a bank in Manhattan, but because she is so close to graduation, she doesn't want to bother with it.

"I've thought about it, but it's a hassle to transfer the money," she said.

However, other students said they have grown tired of the hassles of banking other towns.

"It's a pain, because you constantly have to mail things back home, and you never know if they get there in time," said Julie Hagedorn, senior in secondary math education.

Many Manhattan banks offer student banking plans, making it easier for students to find a good local deal.

Capitol Federal Savings & Loan has a special checking account for students. There is no minimum balance on the account, so students can keep them set up without having a lot of money.

"It's hard for a student to have a set average balance," said Brenda Jorden, assistant branch manager.

If students overdraw their accounts, Capitol Federal offers overdraft protection by connecting the students' credit cards or savings accounts to the checking accounts. It takes a $100 balance to open a checking account at Capitol Federal. When a student opens an account, the first box of checks is free.

One student who does her banking at Capitol Federal said she has benefited from having an account here in Manhattan.

"I really like Cap Fed," said Tera Blair, junior in business. "I think it is really safe, because they use pass codes for everything. I've even talked a few of my friends into going there."

Commerce Bank officials said students who want a bank that is closer to campus can be served by a Commerce branch in the K-State Student Union.

One of the benefits of Commerce Bank is the Wildcat Account. This program allows students to have financial aid directly deposited into their accounts.

"The account is hooked up to the student's ID card," said Terra Ebert, financial services representative and senior in accounting. "There is no minimum balance, and you can write as many checks as you want because checking is free."

The Wildcat Account also has draw-

"RECENTLY IT WAS MY BIRTHDAY AND I WAS GIVEN CHECKS AS BIRTHDAY PRESENTS. I WANTED TO DIVIDE ONE CHECK INTO SAVINGS, CHECKING AND GET CASH. I HAD TO DRIVE AN HOUR-AND-A-HALF FOR ONE CHECK."

SENIOR IN APPAREL AND TEXTILE MARKETING backs to consider, however. The 75-cent charge at all Commerce ATM machines deters some people from using the card.

Paul Bollmann, freshman in electronic journalism, said the 75-cent charge is one reason he is looking for a new bank.

"I don't like the system," he said. "When I need money, I pretty much have to write out a check all the time, because I don't want to pay the 75 cents."

There are other checking accounts offered by Commerce Bank that do not charge to use ATM machines. Ebert said one of the most popular of these is Connections Checking.

"With Connections, there is no minimum balance, you get an ATM card and can apply for a credit card," Ebert said.

Commerce also offers overdraft protection by connecting a credit card to the account.

Some students are afraid of changing banks because they don't want to be just another number. The personal touches a bank can offer are major incentives for some students.

Jennifer Snezek, senior in criminology banks at Union State bank and said she loves the customer service.

Snezek said she had never walked into a fairly big bank and had people greet her by name before.

"I love my bank," Snezek said. "I've hated every single bank I've been at until this one."

An officer at Sunflower Bank said students who have late classes and jobs might want to consider Sunflower's options.

"We offer longer hours and have a branch in the supermarket," said Randy Stitt, consumer loans officer. "We are open late on Fridays and open Saturday morning."

Sunflower offers a "Positively Free Checking" system, where students don't have to maintain a minimum balance. However, overdraft protection is not available on the plan.

"Checking is free, but I hate the fact that if you mess up they charge you an arm and a leg," said Jeremy Hageman, junior in management information systems.

Jackyl's 'Choice Cuts' full of good rock 'n' roll

By TL MEYER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

All the hard rock/heavy metal fans of the late 1980s who miss that sound need to look no further than Jackyl, a band that made an Aggieville appearance earlier this fall.

The band released its first album Jackyl, in August 1992 and with its latest release, Choice Cuts, the band is still going strong.

The album features 15 tracks, with a majority of the songs written by band member Jesse Dupree.

Two remakes on the album are worthy of mention. The first track, We're An American Band, is hauntingly similar to the original version and accurately describes Jackyl's current status, since it has chosen to take on a very hectic concert schedule this year.

The other remake, I Am The Walrus, puts a refreshing hard rock twist on the song written by John Lennon and Paul McCartney.

The album also features two live tracks, Dirty Little Mind (also could be known as Sex As Discussed By The Guitar), and Redneck Punk, full of fast-paced guitar.

If you are all about chainsaws, check out Headed For Destruction and The Lumberjack. They both feature chainsaw introductions, followed by some great guitar playing.

Also high in the guitar department is Down On Me, a remake of a Janis Joplin song and Mister Can You Spare A Dime.

The fourth track, Locked and Loaded, features the unique voice of Brian Johnson from AC/DC helping out on vocals.

Secret Of The Bottle, talks about a broken heart who finds the pain of drinking easier to deal with.

I feel the pain when I've been drinking, but it doesn't seem to cut as deep, is a line from the song that many can relate to.

Jackyl's Choice Cuts is a consistently strong album with few weak areas. It throws in some heavy metal, some Southern rock and a few good songs just about living.

Denver devotes itself to the arts; several cities following example

By ROBERT WELLER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

DENVER — Bucking its image as a Western outpost filled with cowboys and maniacal football fans, the Mile High City is gaining renown for its devotion to the arts and other cultural attractions.

From Dinosaur Ridge, a spot in the Rocky Mountain foothills where visitors can see footprints from long ago, to a regional theater honored this year with a Tony award, the Denver area offers a range of tax-supported attractions that other cities are hard-pressed to match.

The attractions rely on a penny-per-$10 sales tax that will mark its 10th anniversary next year. Because the area's economy has been booming, the money generated for the arts has jumped from $14 million in 1989 to $27 million last year. Nearly 250 organizations receive money.

"Denver is envied and admired," said Peter Donnelly of Seattle's Corporate Council for the Arts.

"We keep using it as a model for funding the arts."

Several cities have adopted the Denver model, including Pittsburgh, Pa. and Salt Lake City. Fresno, Calif., was having success with the plan before a lawsuit by anti-tax groups forced its cancellation.

Cleveland, Seattle-Tacoma, and Austin, Texas, want to follow. Many other cities, from Baltimore to Portland, Ore., have considered the idea.

In Denver, proponents got voters in the six-county metropolitan area to approve the tax 3-to-1 after the oil bust of the 1980s forced the state and city to cut funding for the arts drastically.

The key to winning support in an anti-tax climate was including things like the zoo and Dinosaur Ridge to win broader support, according to Cynthia Stone, spokeswoman for Denver's Arts-to-Zoo program, officially known as the Scientific and Cultural Facilities District.

A decade later, a study says arts and cultural events generated more than $640 million for the Denver-area economy last year. Attendance at the attractions surveyed was 7.9 million, topping the combined attendance for the Denver Broncos and the city's three other big sports teams.

"That Denver can raise upwards of $27 million with this tax is phenomenal," said Tom Schorgl of Cleveland's Community Partnership for the Arts.

Joseph McClain, general manager of the Lyric Opera of Austin, said the Denver tax isn't enough to pay all the bills, but it gives the organizations more security.

"We should really be more secure. It would allow us to take risks and do more interesting things," he said.

Wallace Yvonne McNair, director of Denver's Black American West Museum and Heritage Center, noted the tax money can be used to pay operating expenses. Most foundations donate money only for special projects. As a result, organizations often are forced to think up new programs to get money.

"If you end up chasing dollars all the time, you lose your focus," she said.

Buccaneers beat Packers on Monday Night Football

By FRED GOODALL
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TAMPA, Fla. — Trent Dilfer finally got the best of Brett Favre and carried the rejuvenated Tampa Bay Buccaneers back into the playoff race.

Dilfer threw long touchdown passes to Jacques Green and Bert Emanuel and the Bucs broke a six-game losing streak against Green Bay with a 24-22 victory over the Packers Monday night.

Favre, losing for only the second time in 15 career starts against Tampa Bay, was sacked eight times and lost one of his six fumbles as Green Bay (8-5) missed an opportunity to clinch a wild-card playoff berth.

"We knew we had to get pressure on him to win the game, and we got it done," Bucs defensive tackle Warren Sapp said. "Tonight was special," defensive end Regan Upshaw said. "We wanted to get it done in front of everyone, in front of the world."

The Bucs (6-7) brightened their post-season prospects by climbing into a tie with New Orleans and Arizona for the final NFC wild-card spot with three weeks left in the regular season.

Green and Emanuel, questionable for the game after aggravating a sprained left ankle in practice, scored on the same slant pattern in the second quarter.

Dilfer hit Green in stride crossing the field from the left on a 64-yard scoring play, then found Emanuel crossing from the right for a 62-yard TD that gave the Bucs a 14-3 lead.

"I told Coach Dungy there was no way I was gonna miss this game, even with a sprained ankle," said Emanuel, who Tampa Bay signed to a $16.4 million contract last winter in hopes his speed and experience would help the Bucs get over the hump against the Packers.

Turnovers and falling behind early hampered Tampa Bay throughout the losing streak to the two-time defending NFC champions, who flourished in part because of their ability to contain the Bucs' running game and completely shut down the passing attack.

Dilfer, outplaying Favre for the first time in nine-career meetings, completed only 9 of 22 passes for 181 yards and was intercepted once. Favre finished 29 of 41 for 262 yards.

gives them the chance to talk about AIDS awareness."

Residents will have the chance to participate in a college soap opera at 8 p.m. Wednesday. Each resident will sit in a circle and role play a character who eventually contracts AIDS.

"You think you're OK, but even if you're a virgin you can still get it," Michelle Bertuglia, executive social chair of Moore Hall, said. If you just got your tongue pierced and performed oral sex on someone, you could get HIV, she said.

Lisa Josephson, executive vice president of Moore Hall and junior in secondary education, said this is just one of the scenarios that residents will experience in the soap opera Wednesday night.

A ball of yarn will be passed around as the script is read. Each person will keep a small piece of the yarn, creating a web that will help people to see how easily the HIV virus can spread and travel from person to person.

A guest speaker who is HIV positive will be at Moore Hall at 6:30 p.m. Thursday. The speaker, who wishes to remain anonymous, was contacted by the Project for the event. Dorst said the speaker will talk to residents about what it is like to live with the HIV virus.

current location until the completion of the new food court.

The west side of the Stateroom will be the new location of the food-court area, and the north side will be the new dining area. The new food court should be finished by the end of the spring semester, with new services including Burger King and Chic-Fil-A.

"The new food court and dining area will be a great way to better serve the students," Pitts said. "The food-court area will be in a horseshoe shape, which will allow for easier access."

The dining area will be much more open and comfortable, Pitts said. Seating booths will be placed inside the new dining area, which will not be closed off from the hallway but sectioned off by a short wall.

"The central idea for the enhancement renovation is to open the building up," Mayo said. "The new food-court area that the students will see completed by the end of next semester will prove to be more open and accessible."

Other renovation changes for students to look forward to in the upcoming year include a "New York" style coffee shop, a new computer store near the Union Copy Center and a convenience store near the Information Counter.

officer returned fire, he said.

Linell Wright, a passenger on the bus, said he was only about two feet from the gunman.

"One trooper told his partner 'He's got a gun,'" Wright said. "Then I heard three shots. Next thing you know, everybody had to run off the bus."

The dead man was not identified Monday. His body was sent to Wichita for an autopsy, police said.

Saline County Prosecutor Julie McKenna was expected to release more information at a Tuesday press briefing.

of merchants either donating items or allowing the city to purchase at cost.

The board said it will have to prioritize the skate park and other requests. Board member Joleen Hill said a skate park should be used in conjunction with other activities.

"We don't want to compromise other activities; we want to enhance them," she said.

The skate park probably would be located in a city park. It is too early to know when construction on the park could begin.

"Everybody has a variety of interests in the community. For some people it's dance, for some it's theater, for others it's basketball," DeWeese said. "These are kids interested in skateboarding and in-line skating. If you can provide those types of activities for youth in the community, I think everybody benefits."

PARK

The main concerns of the board were financing the project, finding a location for the park and obtaining an insurance provider. If the city were sued as the result of an accident where it was found negligent, it would have to pay up to $500,000 without a provider.

"There is not enough history to determine a level of risk for the premium of a skate park," DeWeese said.

Skate parks in Lawrence, Salina, Kan., and Hays, Kan., have been contacted to give the board information.

DeWeese said users of the park should be involved in its construction.

"The people who will be using the skate park need to be involved in the whole process," he said.

Stoops, Venables move on to Oklahoma

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If Bill Snyder wasn't a believer in Murphy's Law before, he's probably well on his way after last weekend.

Following the Cats' heartbreaking double-overtime loss to Texas A&M on Saturday and subsequent plunge to the lower tiers of the college football bowl system, K-State took its third significant hit in four days on Tuesday when Snyder confirmed the resignation of defensive coordinator and assistant head coach Mike Stoops.

Stoops will become the defensive coordinator at the University of Oklahoma. The move had been rumored since Stoops' brother Bobby left his position as defensive coordinator at the University of Florida on Nov. 30 to become Oklahoma's 20th head coach. Mike Stoops inherited the Cats' defensive coordinator position in 1996, initially sharing the duties with Bob Cope after his brother's jump from K-State to Florida. With Mike's guidance, the K-State defense finished fourth in the nation in 1997. This year, the Cats were third in the nation in total defense, allowing an average 268 yards per game.

K-State defensive coaches follow former Wildcat Bob Stoops to Norman, Okla.

"The one thing about our defense, which I think is indicative of him, is that they always play together, no matter the situation," offensive guard Jeremy Martin said. "They're tenacious. They never stop."

Doubling as defensive backs' coach, Stoops also presided over K-State's rise to national prominence in the defensive secondary. The Cats continually have turned out talented players under Stoops' guidance, from All-Americans Jaime Mendez and Chris Canty to this year's All-Big 12 Conference safety tandem of Lamar Chapman and Jarrod Cooper.

"He's intense," linebacker David Conley said. "I don't know what he says to those defensive backs, but whenever they have a bad play, they always come back out more hyped up than before."

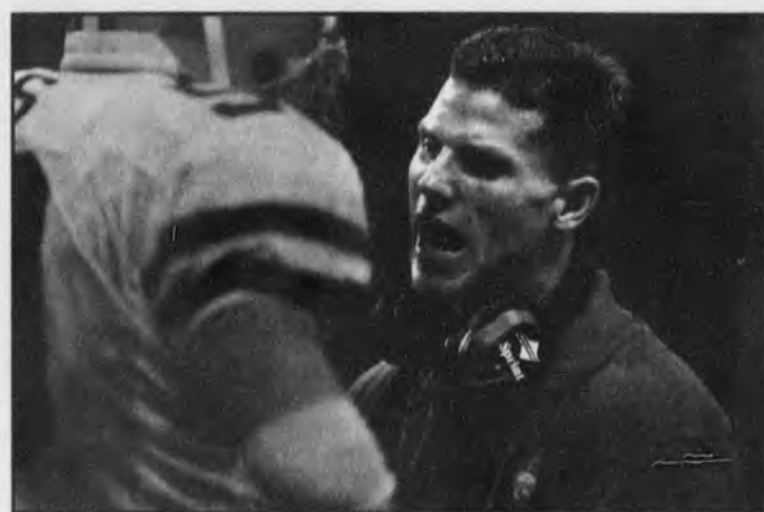

Further complicating matters is the departure of linebackers' coach and defensive run-game coordinator Brent Venables, who will fill the same positions at Oklahoma. This season, Venables' first as run-game coordinator, the Cats were ranked 10th in the nation in rushing defense. The crowning moment came when they kept likely Heisman Trophy winner Ricky Williams to 43 yards on 25 carries during the Cats' 48-7 victory against Texas on Sept. 19.

Venables was the man overseeing the play of K-State's linebacking corps. This year's trio of Travis Ochs, Jeff Kelly and Mark Simoneau is regarded by many as the nation's finest, and all entered the season as candidates for the Butkus Award, with Kelly ascending to the semifinals.

"Coach Venables has been the catalyst for everything I've done here," middle linebacker Ben Leber said. "He's pushed me. He's made me work hard, and he's made me realize what it takes to be a Division I football player, and I love him for that."

CONSTRUCTION COMPLETE

Shane Fingelsen, an employee of Schultz Construction, creates a window in the wall of the International Student Center on Aug. 25 1998. Construction of the Taiwan and Korea wings began in May and was completed last week.

$300,000 in renovations finished on International Student Center

By NANCY GRATHWOHL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The International Student Center has a new look. The renovation of two new wings makes the center better equipped to meet the needs of international students.

"About five years ago, we did an assessment of the needs of the International Student Center," said William Richter, assistant provost of international programs. "As the number of international students has grown, the ability for the center to deliver services was impaired."

Construction on the building began in May and ended last week. Students, faculty and staff will move into the new wings, named the Taiwan and Korean wings, this week.

The Korean room, which formerly served as office space, is now a TV and computer room.

"There will be a lot more flexible programming," Center Director Donna Davis said. "We just plain needed more space."

The Taiwan wing will serve as the foreign students' offices, which will provide international students with assistance on their visas and any other problems they might encounter, Richter said.

The renovation cost more than $300,000.

"All of the money for the project came from private funding," Davis said.

"Some came from past fund-raisers and generous donations from friends. Most of the money for the Taiwan and Korean rooms came from the Taiwan and Korean alumni and friends."

A committee consisting of faculty, townspeople, alumni and a few students was host to many fund-raisers. One of its biggest efforts was a benefit concert from which all proceeds were donated to the renovation. It also had two Persian carpet sales.

The center's new look will aid recruiting, Richter said. "These changes allow us to move from a reactive to a proactive strategy for international student recruitment," Richter said.

Previously, the center only allowed international student groups that had at least 50 members or groups with an international focus to use the building. Now it will allow non-international groups to use the building for a fee.

"We will use the money for more programming and to provide more speakers," Davis said.

The new equipment, programs and additional staff are the biggest asset, Richter said.

"It is not just the bricks and mortar," he said. "It is the whole integrated expansion in the capacity of the International Student Center to serve the students and the Manhattan community."

Architect concentrates on spirit of building

By RUSSELL FORTMEYER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The International Student Center's intentions were always most evident in the footbridge that connected it to the sidewalk across a campus creek since it originally was built in 1978.

The metaphor of crossing a border to a new experience was a gesture on behalf of architect William R. Eidson.

That approach to design — considering the spirit of the building's effects on visitors — was very much a part of what Rafael Architects Inc. of Kansas City, Mo., had in mind when they approached the project.

"It was an education we went through understanding the student center and the international value of the center," said Rafael Garcia, principal architect with Rafael Architects. "You are not dealing with a building. You are dealing with a culture and a spirit."

The result, which is finished and open to the public, is a natural completion of the courtyard that existed in the original collection of two buildings. The new building keeps the existing low-scale, limestone and pitched roof aesthetic of the complex but adds a profusion of natural redwood, exposed heavy timber construction and expressive use of glass. It's almost as if the building grew from its wooded

Fall break proposal rejuvenated

■ New pitch now focuses on faculty, administration need for fall break.

By TIM RICHARDSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Faculty need a break, too.

That's part of the new pitch behind a recycled proposal by students to Faculty Senate and administrators that K-State needs a fall break.

Student senators presented the idea to Faculty Senate last year, but without a specific proposal. It passed out of committee but was defeated by the full Senate. Talat Rahman, Faculty Senate president, said she is open to the idea, but Student Senate should prove the changes would be better for students academically.

"At the moment, people are not taking it seriously," she said. "That's a burden that is on the students."

The proposal includes creating a two-day fall break and either eliminating the two days in the spring before the Martin Luther King Jr. holiday or beginning class on Monday of the week before the holiday, thereby eliminating a two-day week. Any missed days would need to be made up to comply with the 75-day minimum set up by the Kansas Board of Regents.

"We thought it might be more appealing to the administration and faculty," said Rhett Trujillo.

■ Judiciary Committee staff begins drafting articles of impeachment.

By DAVID ESPO

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Struggling to stave off impeachment, President Clinton's defenders pleaded his case Tuesday before the House Judiciary Committee. One moderate GOP lawmaker signaled support for censure as an alternative punishment.

"As surely as we know that what he did was sinful, we also know it is not impeachable," White House lawyer Gregory Craig told a committee bristling with skeptical Republicans.

Other witnesses, including former lawmakers who sat in judgment of Richard Nixon a quarter-century ago, argued that Clinton's conduct in the Monica Lewinsky affair was no Watergate and thus not worthy of impeachment.

Even so, Republicans flashed frustration as the session dragged on for 11 hours. "It's been very disappointing that we've had very little discussion of the actual facts of the case," said Rep. Charles Canady, R-Fla., after more than eight hours of testimony without

Organizers hope drive will end blood shortage

The American Red Cross is hoping to collect 246 units of blood at its annual December drive today and tomorrow at Pottorf Hall in CCo Park.

Although the Red Cross needs all blood types, it is experiencing shortages of O-positive, O-negative and B-negative types. Riley County Red Cross executive director Beryl Adams said getting enough donors during the holiday season can be difficult, because people are busy with different activities.

"We are hoping this is a successful drive, and we can collect all of the units we need," she said.

Shortages often result from people needing certain kinds of surgery, causing demand to exceed the amount donated.

"It's not unusual to find shortages during the summer months," she said. "Most of the year you don't run into major shortages."

A variety of K-State items will be given away. Hats, T-shirts, Alamo Bowl items and other door prizes have been given to the Red Cross for donors.

Adams said the items are used to show support for the football team and to attract people to donate blood.

"It can be an incentive for someone who isn't sure they can make it over to donate," Adams said.

Robert Poresky, associate professor of family studies and human service, is giving extra credit to students who donate blood. Students in his Introduction to Human Development class receive 10 extra points out of 400 to 500 total for the course.

He said the system has been successful in the past, and it teaches students to help people in need.

"I think it is important for them to get into the notion of helping others," he said.

The majority of people who donate blood have a good first experience, Adams said. Few people have exaggerated symptoms, such as feeling weak, which is important in getting more people to donate in the future.

"If they have a good first experience, they are not going to be hesitant about coming back again," she said.

Donors should eat a regular meal and drink fluids before giving blood. The process takes about an hour.

"It's not a difficult process," Adams said. "For anybody who might be considering it, it's definitely the gift of life."

City opposes state law meant to enforce ADA

TOPEKA — Hays, Kan., has no legal responsibility to enforce a state law requiring older hotels, restaurants and other such buildings to be accessible to people with disabilities, the Kansas Supreme Court was told Tuesday.

However, those challenging that position said the city is wrong and pointed to a lower court ruling ordering the city to enforce the law.

At issue is the state law spelling out responsibility for enforcing the federal Americans with Disabilities Act in Kansas. An Ellis County District Court judge last year ruled the city has that responsibility. The city appealed the ruling.

A decision by the seven-member Supreme Court isn't expected until at least Jan. 22.

Attorney John Bird, arguing for the city, told the court the issue "isn't about whether federal or Kansas laws should be enforced but rather how and by whom they are to be enforced."

Wichita attorney David Calvert, representing the disabled plaintiffs, told the state's highest court that changes in the 1994 law make it clear that enforcement is the city's responsibility — even if it doesn't want to do it.

"Their argument is that cities never had to enforce handicap standards, and it would be too costly," said Calvert, who made his case from his wheelchair. "The only way to make it enforceable is to have the cities enforce it."

The ADA sets standards for access to people with disabilities, such as Lou Ann Kibbee and Brian Atwell, who sued the city. Joining them is LINK Inc., a center for independent living.

The issue for the court is the role the city has in enforcing ADA with private businesses that opened their doors to the public before the 1990 law was in place.

There is no disagreement that cities must enforce the ADA for publicly financed buildings such as schools, courthouses and hospitals, or for buildings constructed after enactment of the federal law.

The city argues that in spelling out who would handle enforcement in Kansas, the Legislature removed the city's responsibility for enforcement of that section.

Calvert said the lawsuit began because a motel-restaurant in Hays didn't have a restroom accessible to wheelchairs.

The city was asked to require the business to make the necessary changes.

Officials said ADA enforcement on such businesses wasn't its responsibility but a job for the attorney general's office.

Trooper resigns after allegation of affair

OKLAHOMA CITY — One of Lt. Gov. Mary Fallin's Highway Patrol bodyguards resigned after being accused of having an affair with her.

The accusation, which has not been confirmed, was made by her husband's lawyer during divorce proceedings last week.

Fallin, 43, a Republican, was elected to a second term in November and has been touted as a possible GOP candidate for governor.

Rumors surfaced in early September about her and a member of her security detail, Public Safety Commissioner Bob Ricks said.

The trooper, whose name was not released, first denied the allegations, but after questioning again in November, he admitted to unprofessional conduct and was permitted to resign, Ricks said in a statement Monday.

"His admission did not indicate that sexual activity was involved," Ricks said.

Ricks didn't elaborate on the nature of the unprofessional conduct, and his office said he was out of town Tuesday.

Fallin filed for divorce from her husband, dentist Joe Fallin, and has told a judge he used drugs and physically abused her. The couple have two children, ages 11 and 8.

Fallin has denied his wife's accusations. He said he hired a private investigator to follow her, and at a hearing last week, his lawyer described her relationship with the trooper as an affair.

District Judge Jerry Bass prevented Fallin's attorney from pursuing questions about the matter.

Fallin's lawyer, Lana Tyree, said her client would not comment. In court, Fallin said the rumors about her and one of her bodyguards were started by her husband.

Massive power outage halts San Francisco

SAN FRANCISCO — A construction crew's mistake caused a blackout across San Francisco on Tuesday, trapping office workers in high-rise elevators, stopping trains, halting the city's famous cable cars and forcing the airport to divert incoming planes.

"Chaos, complete chaos," Ricky Fairley, a hotel security guard, said. "Even the birds are crazy. They just started howling and screaming, too. People don't know where to go."

The power went out across a 49-square-mile area of the San Francisco Peninsula at 8:17 a.m. Pacific Gas & Electric said about 940,000 people lost power, and electricity was being restored piecemeal through the day.

A construction crew forgot to remove the ground wire after completing maintenance on a substation switchboard, causing a blowout and triggering a chain reaction that knocked two generators offline, PG&E president Gordon Smith said. Sabotage caused a similar blackout 14 months ago, leaving about 250,000 people in the dark for 3 1/2 hours.

"It appears at this time that simple human error may have been involved in the outage," Smith said. "Procedures appear not to have been followed to the letter."

There were no reports of major accidents, injuries or looting. For downtown workers, it was generally only an inconvenience.

Half of the city's fleet of electric-powered buses, trolleys and trains was stranded, including dozens of trains that got stuck in tunnels under the city. Hundreds of passengers had to be led out on foot, spokesman Emilio Cruz said.

About 50 high-rises had stuck elevators with unknown numbers of people trapped inside, and firefighters worked with elevator companies to get them out. Fire Department Inspector Kaan Chin said.

Planes bound for San Francisco International Airport were sent instead to San Jose or Oakland.

Editor's Note: This is the first of two stories looking at the role of architecture at K-State. Thursday's feature will consider the way in which architects are chosen for campus projects.

In November 1951, the Los Angeles modernist architect Richard Neutra visited K-State's campus and delivered a lecture.

According to the Collegian, in the days after Neutra's visit, a group of five architecture students distributed 3,500 copies of a pamphlet criticizing K-State's "outmoded" pseudo-gothic architectural styles as "intellectually dishonest" and not "in tune with contemporary work."

In a Dec. 4, 1951, Collegian letter to the editor, W.N. Gardner, an architecture student, wrote the new design of the K-State Student Union was bad because of "the lack of creative planning or a creative plan." He continued to criticize the state architect's office for merely arranging, not designing, the functions of the Union.

Other campus critics, with many in the College of Engineering and Architecture, as it was known at the time, suggested K-State taught one kind of architecture but practiced another.

In the 1990s, building projects on campus — such as the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art and Hale Library — renewed the dialogue about why architecture matters at a university. In many respects, the field of discussion is divided between an administration that has been on a building spree and faculty in the College of Architecture, Planning and Design who have been less than apprehensive to speak about this issue.

"I think a university should have an intelligent building program and very few do," The Wall Street Journal architecture critic Ada Louise Huxtable said. The Pulitzer Prize-winning critic, of considerable influence and witness to some of the century's greatest architectural happenings, often has been disappointed by decisions made for university building programs in which she has participated.

"Most are in the hands of development officers," she said, speaking from her Massachusetts home. "Many are disasters — the last thing you would expect of a university."

The administration has recognized concerns with recent design in the campus community. In 1998, the university allocated $500,000 toward hiring a planning consultant to develop a campus master plan. It's not known whether that will include a program for architecture.

Susanne Siepl-Coates, associate professor of architecture, will teach a class next semester on healing environments — architecture that contributes to the resilience of the human spirit.

"There are people who say first we shape the environment, and then it shapes us," Siepl-Coates said. "The environment can encourage or inhibit social interaction but also learning."

Siepl-Coates said recent K-State buildings, such as Throckmorton Hall, emphasize efficiency, technology and economy at the expense of human hopes, aspirations and desires.

Many others in the College of Architecture, Planning and Design said they agree that K-State's physical environments — the buildings, outdoor spaces and transportation networks — are poor. They cite the way recent buildings ignore the need for the creation of outdoor space or for developing relationships between buildings. That's important, many faculty members say, because the quality of the environment corresponds to the quality of education.

"I think this is an environment that will affect your thinking about the world for the rest of your life," Michael McNamara, associate professor of architecture, said. An outspoken critic of campus design, he most recently was involved in writing the building program used in the competition for the design of the art museum.

"The university is a blend of tradition and history and an engagement with the present and the future," he said. "The university is a model. If the educated members of society don't value good design, then that is a diminished value in the society."

Since President Jon Wefald came to K-State in 1986, he has overseen the construction of the art museum, Hale Library, the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, the Throckmorton Hall expansion and renovations of many of the existing campus buildings — all but the museum and library are products of Kansas architects.

While Wefald is genuinely happy with the recent buildings at K-State, he thinks the campus could do better in representing contemporary architectural theory.

"In general, I think we do a good job with these buildings," Wefald said. "Our campus is as beautiful as any college campus in the country."

As a public institution of higher learning, some might argue it is the responsibility of K-State to uphold high design standards and build with a serious program of architecture.

"I think the academy, in terms of its built environment, should be somewhat exemplary and put forward ideas and strategies that may have a critical role to play vis-à-vis the society's examples," said Mark Shapiro, head of the Department of Architecture.

"I think the academy is obliged to develop its environment so it is a model," he said. "I think K-State has tried to do this to some extent, but at least in my opinion, K-State could do better."

One international visitor to campus this semester, Kurt Scholz, a school-board president from Vienna, described a recent multimillion-dollar transformation of Viennese schools as a bold decision to bring contemporary design concepts to the public via public institutions.

"You can teach it from chalk or books or give people a chance to live in contemporary architecture," Scholz said.

As for the anonymous student critics of architecture in 1951, they later revealed themselves and the debate of architecture simmered down. Yet, the questions they raised still apply.

"You've always taught a very progressive architecture in that part of the country," Huxtable said.

"To teach one kind of architecture and practice another is fairly typical. It isn't a matter of experience but being knowledgeable enough to understand what's going on in the world of architecture and to see if that meets the needs of the university."

OUR VIEW

Break would benefit all K-State students

It is interesting to think that while spring break is a tradition, nobody ever bothered to find out why we don't have a break in the fall.

Certainly, spring break is not known for maintaining high academic standards. The break never has been associated with the rigors of academia, but it provides exactly what breaks should provide — free time. It offers time to enjoy the spring season, time to rest, time to go home and visit family, time to travel or do community service, and in some cases, time to let loose and party.

In the fall, however, students toil through nearly 14 unbroken weeks of activity. Our weekends increasingly are invaded by homework and projects. Many of us work part-time jobs to pay for school. There are always activities in which to participate, and there are limits to the amount people can contribute before they begin to lose focus.

The truth is that any small measure the administration and Faculty Senate can take to break up 14 weeks of late-night coffee runs and high blood pressure is worthwhile. Academic performance is entirely dependent upon good physical and mental health. Fatigued students will not put adequate effort into their studies. They will fall asleep doing reading assignments. They will sleep through lectures. They will fail to get up on time for class. They will look for ways to procrastinate.

Students are not any lazier now than they have been before, but it makes sense that the amount of motivation students put toward their work diminishes each time they go through a period of high stress. November already is regarded as a time to neglect studies — a time to embrace the apathy within and slack off. Why wouldn't the university want to change that?

The College of Veterinary Medicine offers its students a break in the fall. Since Vet-Med is a graduate school, one might assume its students are more seasoned to the rigors of college than freshmen — that they are more driven than the typical undergraduate. Yet, we don't expect them to go through the full period between Labor Day and Thanksgiving without respite.

For students who hail from places far away, there is no opportunity to go home for any length of time in the fall without taking time off from school. Adding a fall break would make it easier for students, especially our younger ones, to visit with their parents, to go home to collect things they need, to reaffirm their purpose in college — take your pick.

The break would not truncate class time — school either would start earlier in the fall or earlier in the spring to accommodate a proposed two-day break.

Faculty members should look at their students' grades for the fall. If the lowest test scores are in the middle of the semester, it should be reason enough to adopt a fall break.

INSTITUTIONAL TEMPTATIONS

Why responsibility yields greed and bad architecture

How super-terrific it must be to use the institutional prestige of K-State to realize personal ambitions.

In the last five years, administrative avarice has propelled a few select university building projects toward completion in a spectacle of personal privilege and intellectual regression.

Ladies and gentlemen, I give you the Colbert Hills Golf Course and the K-State Alumni Center — two monuments to ego that defy the rational student's attempts at explanation. Together, they account for a $20 million diversion of private funds from the university that seems criminal in these fiscally tight days.

Why the dramatic introduction? Because this journalist has had to keep his poisonous lips closed in objectivity for the past five years as the physical environment of the university he loves so dearly disintegrated into the vile country club its suit-and-tie crowd covets.

Apparently, as long as you pretend to have the best interests of the school at heart, you literally can get away with environmental rape. No one will stop you because, if gossip circles are considered gospel, you're running the university, anyway.

Consider, Wildcats, our vice president for institutional advancement, Robert Krause. He's spent a pretty penny and mucho hours working behind-the-scenes on a multi-million dollar real estate development in western Manhattan (oh, it also includes a golf course). In this case, K-State's golf program has become the willing whore to the real estate interests of Krause's father-in-law, developer extraordinaire Jack Vanier. His conventionally lame walled subdivision, Grand Mere, is to neighborhoods what Las Vegas's Luxor Hotel and Casino is to Egypt — an ersatz knock-off founded on the almighty dollar.

Boosting Vanier's investment returns is the institutional distinction of K-State. I'm sure the Tommy Hilfiger golf crowd that will dominate this elite playground will tip a haypenny or two toward the pressing academic needs of campus — right after they flush down a glass of white Zinfandel in the posh clubhouse and toss the crystal into the blazing fire built with the wood of the trees that used to blanket the site.

Oh, but this is an environmentally sound golf course. OK, I'll at least concede that there will be plenty of green to go around.

No one's going to make any money off of the Alumni Center project on the southwest corner of campus, not even the university. I'm hard-pressed to explain just what the university is getting from the Alumni Center, period.

From my experience, there aren't many people outside of the administration and the Alumni Association who actually are excited about this project. The Alumni Center is a representation of nearly everything one can despise about institutional bureaucracy: exclusivity, poor aesthetics, retardataire thinking, bragging and a self-serving attitude.

The idea of placing an over-scaled residential country club (I like to call it Jane Eyre's house) on the most prominent corner of the university is monstrous. That the proposed design does nothing to address neglected Memorial Stadium, potential parking nightmares or the pressing need for a gateway to K-State at the 17th Street entrance is pathetic, if not criminal.

Yet, we press on in institutional ignorance. Someone in Anderson Hall has willed this dreadful carcass to be so, and far be it for the campus architectural community to stand in its way. The University of Kansas has a meaningless shell of an alumni center, so why can't we?

Harsh words, yes, but not without purpose. When you're dealing with institutional ignorance on this wide a scale, desperate times call for desperate measures. Extreme denial of sensible design created another extremity — the architecture critic.

In this case, K-State's golf program has become the willing whore to the real estate interests of Krause's father-in-law, developer extraordinaire Jack Vanier.

I don't loathe K-State, but I do the few individuals who flaunt their power as they flout the academic integrity of this institution, whether that be through parading a juvenile design for the Alumni Center through the College of Architecture, Planning and Design or suggesting an expensive golf course is going to push K-State into the academic stratosphere.

When it comes to facility development on this campus, the past few years have been baby steps. We've learned we need more oversight, more community involvement, a more determined master plan, but we're also dealing with some administrators (and their allies) who aren't entirely ready to give up free reign.

Many of us still have the egotistical notion that we know better, that trained professionals — like architects — are hired by K-State merely to fulfill our childish fantasies and not to challenge the campus intellectually with intelligent, contemporary design. One imagines administrators sitting around on the weekends dreaming up how they want buildings to look or which projects can proceed, without any rhyme or reason.

Last time I checked, Walt Disney does not work in the administration. However, that has not kept some of its members from pretending.

When end of world comes, it will play by its own clock

VIEWPOINT

JASON RUCKER

The millennium approaches. In just less than 13 months the year 2000 arrives. What will come with it? That's the big question. Some people think we're in for a big party, others see serious computer problems, and some think it will be much worse — Armageddon.

The end of the world is one of the most popular legends in the world. Whether it's fire and brimstone, massive earthquakes, killer asteroids or nuclear holocaust, every culture has its own version of the story. It's the ultimate campfire tale.

The interesting thing about the whole ordeal is that most of the current speculation about the end of the world centers around something as fickle as a calendar. Not some cosmic event that would matter to the universe but a piece of paper with numbers on it made up by people who, as usual, are sure they are the center of the universe.

I did a little checking into calendars and found some interesting stuff. Have you ever really looked at an Aztec calendar? You know those plaques with those round symbols with the face in the middle and all of the glyphs surrounding it that you often see on the walls in Mexican food places? There is some spooky stuff going on in the Aztec calendar.

For one thing, it is the only calendar that has an end. Surrounding the face on the calendar are four squares, and those represent the four worlds the gods destroyed before this world was born and how they ended. The first world was destroyed by wild animals, the second by wind, the third by fire and the fourth by flood. According to Aztec belief, this world will be destroyed by a great earthquake. Dates for the cataclysm of this world differ, but some scholars of the Aztec culture believe the calendar predicts the end will come within the next decade.

The Aztec solar calendar had 365 days in each year, and as we know, the Earth revolves around the sun at a rate of closer to one revolution for each 365.25 days. This was known to Alexandrian astronomers such as Sosigenes, which is why the Julian calendar had 365.25 days in each of its years.

Just after the conquest of Egypt, Julius Caesar consulted Sosigenes about formulating a proper calendar for the Roman empire. In 46 B.C., the Julian calendar officially was adopted and was used widely for centuries. However, further study found that the years of the Julian calendar were 11.2 minutes too long each year.

So in 1582, Pope Gregory the XIII officially adopted the aptly named Gregorian calendar. This is the calendar used throughout the world today.

The last time a god was alleged to have walked the Earth, the Julian calendar was in place. If Armageddon is to come 2000 years following his passing, which calendar are we supposed to judge this by? The Julian calendar, Jan. 1, 2000, is the same as January 12, 2000, by the Gregorian calendar (the one we use today).

Then comes the question, why 2000? Apparently people think an event as chaotic as the end of the world most likely would come on a nice round number. This isn't the first time people have had these thoughts.

Thousands of people were sure the world would end on Jan. 1, 1000. In Europe at the turn of the millennium, the Bible was outlawed, and the people had to get God's words directly from the clergy. They were told to prepare for the end of the world. Many people gave the church all of their possessions to show their good faith and to be in the grace of God when the end came. Jan. 1 came and went, and the people were without homes or food, so the Pope allowed the people to return to their homes as renters (he used the money to fund crusades into Jerusalem).

However, those who fail to learn history are doomed to repeat it. I know people who are certain the end is near. Some of them plan to quit their jobs at the end of this year and spend "the last year" traveling the world, spending all of their life savings.

In reality, the scariest thing about the approaching millennium is the possibility of doomsday cults trying to help Armageddon out a little. Domsday cults rose and fell with the last millennium, and they are on the rise as this one approaches. For example, the Aum Shinrikyo cult of Japan claimed responsibility for the Sarin gas attack on the Tokyo subway in March 1995.

If the Aum Shinrikyo claim is any indicator of what weapons of mass destruction other terrorist groups might have access to, I think the last place I'll want to be is Times Square when the ball drops to ring in the new year. That is likely the ultimate doomsday target. I think I'll be partying in a bomb shelter somewhere.

Players need coaches who understand game

Editor,

I am a youth soccer coach for the Manhattan Department of Parks and Recreation and am writing to inform K-State students about the program and what a difference they can make.

From what I saw during this past fall's soccer season, parent coaches, and most adult coaches in general, were not helping the kids learn the game well. This is because most of the adults are not familiar with the sport of soccer and are not able to coach it well. Of the 100 head coaches for fall soccer, only 32 were of college age.

To remedy this problem, we must have more college-aged coaches who know and love the sport of soccer and are better able to help the kids learn the game. In late January or early February, there should be advertisements in the Collegian requesting youth-soccer coaches. Follow up on the ad, or you can contact the Manhattan Department of Parks and Recreation at 587-2757. Maybe you can help Manhattan's youth.

Finals schedule helps by making us cram

Editor,

In response to the letter regarding the restructuring of finals, written by Shawna M. Saathoff, sophomore in pre-professional business administration, I say this:

Your letter proposed restructuring finals week because having a semester's worth of finals within one week is a problem for students and very stressful. Restructure finals week, you say, and do something to de-stress the life of the common student.

Well, coming into my seventh finals week, and after reading your letter, it occurred to me that the insanity of finals week, which you are trying to solve, is not a product of any ignorance by the Committee on Academic Policy on the average student's life. Rather, it has become vehemently clear to me that it is the plan. Yes, my friend, they are doing it because they know what we go through, and that is their goal. Even more confusing is the fact that, as this also has become clear to me, they do it because it is good for us.

The committee, in all its far-sighted wisdom, understands that normal students, by their very nature, work only so hard as their deadlines force them. To do otherwise undermines the necessity of deadlines. In the end, KU's wussy final-week schedule only panders to the laziness and procrastination inherent to facing deadlines. The committee, in their well-groomed style, constructed the current deadline schedule out of consideration that we, as students, will work only as hard as the proportion of work we are given. Treat us like geniuses, and we become geniuses; treat us like procrastinators, and we become KU.

The choice is clear, Shawna: In all of your well-intended proactions, it ultimately will defeat the very essence of why we, as students, sit through class each day (if we even go) and why there is any proclivity to success here at K-State, football or otherwise. Be careful what you wish for, friend.

Think before you drink if you must drink at all

Editor,

Football aside, there is no issue pertaining to college campuses that currently is receiving more national attention from the media than alcohol.

Just last week, Jack Ivey Jr., 22, a University of Texas student, drank himself to death, and alcohol was blamed in the shooting death of Neil Davis Jr., 21, at North Carolina State. Earlier this month, Bradley McCue of Michigan State celebrated his 21st birthday. What he didn't know was the celebration would mark his "death day" because he died that night from alcohol poisoning.

Both the University of Missouri and the University of Kansas are implementing hard-line stands toward dry living organizations, and K-State can't be far behind in consideration of similar policies. How big of an issue is alcohol at K-State, where 94 percent of us drink, 81 percent of us drink and drive, and 5 percent of us will be arrested for driving under the influence?

Statistically, every 32 minutes someone is killed in an alcohol-related incident.

Alcohol is huge at K-State; it's in your hall; chances are it's in your room! What questions must we ask about this potentially lethal substance in our refrigerators? The most important: Is alcohol the enemy? It's easy to blame tragedy and misery on alcohol itself.

"Nothing is intrinsically good or evil, (only) its manner of usage may make it so," St. Thomas Aquinas wrote.

That means we can't blame our actions on the bottle. Just like everything else, it comes down to the decisions we make. And you came to college to have fun and live free... well, maybe so did Jack Ivey, Neil Davis, and Bradley McCue.

The challenge is simple: Examine the role alcohol plays in your life and in the life of your friends. Decide whether you want to have a run-in with any of the following: DUI, minor in possession, chronic alcoholism, unwanted sex/pregnancy, traffic fatality, fatal overdose.

If you think you and your friends are immune to these consequences of over-consumption, you're wrong.

Set your limits long before you drink, and stick to them no matter what. Look out for your friends. Be one of the millions who enjoy alcohol in moderation or abstain altogether.

If you do not, you continue to cast your name into the jar — the jar from which a name is drawn every 32 minutes. Who's next? Oh, please tell me it won't be you, K-State.

Gramatica denied repeat of Groza

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. — Florida State's Sebastian Janikowski, who connected on 27 of 32 field goal attempts this year, won the 1998 Lou Groza award as college football's top kicker on Tuesday.

Janikowski, who also kicked 42 extra points, got 213 points in the voting, followed by K-State's Martin Gramatica, the 1997 winner, with 209 and Oregon's Nathan Villegas with 126.

"I'm feeling great; I can't be more happy," Janikowski, who was unable to attend the awards banquet because he was taking final exams, said via conference call. "I especially want to thank all of my teammates."

Florida State coach Bobby Bowden was at the awards banquet for the announcement. The Seminoles play top-ranked Tennessee on Jan. 4 for the national championship in the Fiesta Bowl.

Janikowski left Poland in 1994 to live with his father, Henry, who had settled in the United States eight years earlier. A top soccer player, the younger Janikowski started playing football as a high school senior.

A&M's Dat Nguyen wins Lombardi Award

By MICHAEL A. LUTZ
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

HOUSTON — The smallest guy on the dais walked off with the big prize.

Linebacker Dat Nguyen, Texas A&M's career tackles leader despite his 5-foot-11, 221-pound size, was named the winner of the 29th annual Lombardi Award as the nation's top collegiate lineman on Tuesday night.

Nguyen beat Ohio State linebacker Andy Katzenmoyer (6-4, 265), Wisconsin tackle Aaron Gibson (6-7, 370) and Georgia tackle Matt Stinchcomb (6-6, 295) for the honor.

"You take all the positive adjectives used to describe a person, and they all fit Dat Nguyen," Texas A&M coach R.C. Slocum said. "What he has done in football and how he has handled the success is amazing."

Nguyen, the smallest of the finalists, had 517 career tackles with the Aggies, including 17 in last week's 36-33 upset of K-State in the Big 12 Conference championship game.

"Dat plays the game at such a high level because of his desire and instincts," Slocum said.

"He has an uncanny eye to know where the ball is going. He's not a player who has a good game this week and not next. He has great games every week."

Nguyen will play his final college game Jan. 1 against Katzenmoyer and Ohio State in the Sugar Bowl at New Orleans.

"It's an honor to be here and represent my school and my teammates," Nguyen said. "I don't like to be singled out. I came to A&M because of the Wrecking Crew defense. I didn't do this by myself."

Nguyen was disenchanted when he first arrived at A&M because he didn't get to play immediately. But once he got on the field, the Aggies knew they had a player.

"To be honest, we didn't know how good he was," Slocum said. "We knew he was good because we gave him a scholarship, but early that first year, we put him in a game and figured that this guy is pretty good."

Nguyen has had to overcome more obstacles than his smallish frame.

Dat's parents fled Vietnam in 1975 with his five brothers and sisters and Dat, the sixth child, on the way. Nguyen was born in a refugee camp in Arkansas before the family moved to Texas and Nguyen gave up soccer to play football.

"I do a lot of work with kids now, trying to give back because everyone was so helpful to my parents when they came to this country," Nguyen said. "I think that is what you are supposed to do."

Gibson, among the nation's biggest linemen, holds Wisconsin weight-room records with a 745-pound squat.

Katzenmoyer was a finalist for the Lombardi last year as a sophomore. He's been a mainstay this season for the Buckeyes, who were ranked No. 1 most of the season until beaten by Michigan State.

Stinchcomb missed the dinner because he was in New York for the Hall of Fame dinner to accept an $18,000 postgraduate scholarship.

He carried a 3.94 grade point average into his senior season.

SHOCKED SHOCKERS

Hot-shooting 1st half propels Cats to win over Wichita State

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Shocker tandem of Maurice Evans and Jason Perez might have beaten the Wildcats on Tuesday night.

However, the rest of the Shockers only scored 10 points as the Cats used solid team play to hold Wichita State to its lowest scoring output against K-State since 1993 to mangle the Shockers 64-47 in front of 10,541 fans at Bramlage Coliseum.

Putting both offense and defense together, the Wildcats kept the Shockers to 34-percent shooting and shot a season-high 63 percent from the floor in the first half to improve its record to 7-2.

"This game was probably the most complete game we've played all season," head coach Tom Asbury said. "Our intensity was close to matching Wichita State's. I was pleased with our energy. It was a good effort."

Against his hometown team, senior forward Manny Dies tossed in 16 points and pulled down seven rebounds, while front court mate Josh Reid, senior guard/forward, scored 17 points, making six out of his eight shots.

"It's time Manny steps up," Asbury said. "He had an awfully good game. He was more active tonight."

Evans, who averages almost 24 points a game, was almost nonexistent in the first half as he shot 0-6 from the floor.

In the second half, Evans came out scoring 23 points, including six treys. Regardless of Evan's performance, the Cats kept the lead.

"I sure wish we had Maurice Evans," Asbury said. "He is an awfully good player."

Despite K-State's offensive and defensive display, Asbury said its 20 turnovers was too much.

"We played pretty efficiently offensively, but we still turned the ball over too much," he said. "We just had too many turnovers."

Senior point guard Chris Griffin said the team wanted to come out and make a statement.

"We wanted to come out and prove we had a good defense and we could protect our home court," he said. "Wichita State is a very physical team, a very good defensive team."

K-State also out-rebounded the Shockers 41-21, the sixth team it beat on the board this season.

Wildcat guard Ayome May returned to Manhattan on Tuesday after spending four days at the Mayo Clinic in Minnesota undergoing tests for a recurring intestinal ailment.

"They stuck about every medical instrument known to man in him," Asbury said. "I thought he played well, considering his weekend."

K-State defense overwhelms rivals

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's 64-47 win against the Wichita State Shockers proved to be a physical and intense game, leaving Cortez Groves with a broken nose and a concussion. With the pressure turned up, the Cats rose to the occasion and beared down to produce their most complete defensive effort of the year, holding the Shockers to just 34-percent shooting from the field.

K-State held the Shockers to season defensive lows in points allowed, field-goal attempts (50), three-point attempts (18), free throws made and attempted (5-11), free-throw percentage (.455), and rebounds (21). The Cats also outscored the Shockers 32-8 in the paint.

At the half, K-State held the Shockers to just two points in the paint. Only three players put points on the board for Wichita State in the first half, with Jason Perez scoring nine of the 14, a Bramlage Coliseum record for fewest points scored in a half.

"We hoped to dominate," head coach Tom Asbury said.

"We do a great job down low. We've got high-quality players, players with experience. There aren't any young guys down there. We've got three great players in Manny (Dies), Tony (Kitt) and Ty (Sims). These guys should be really good inside."

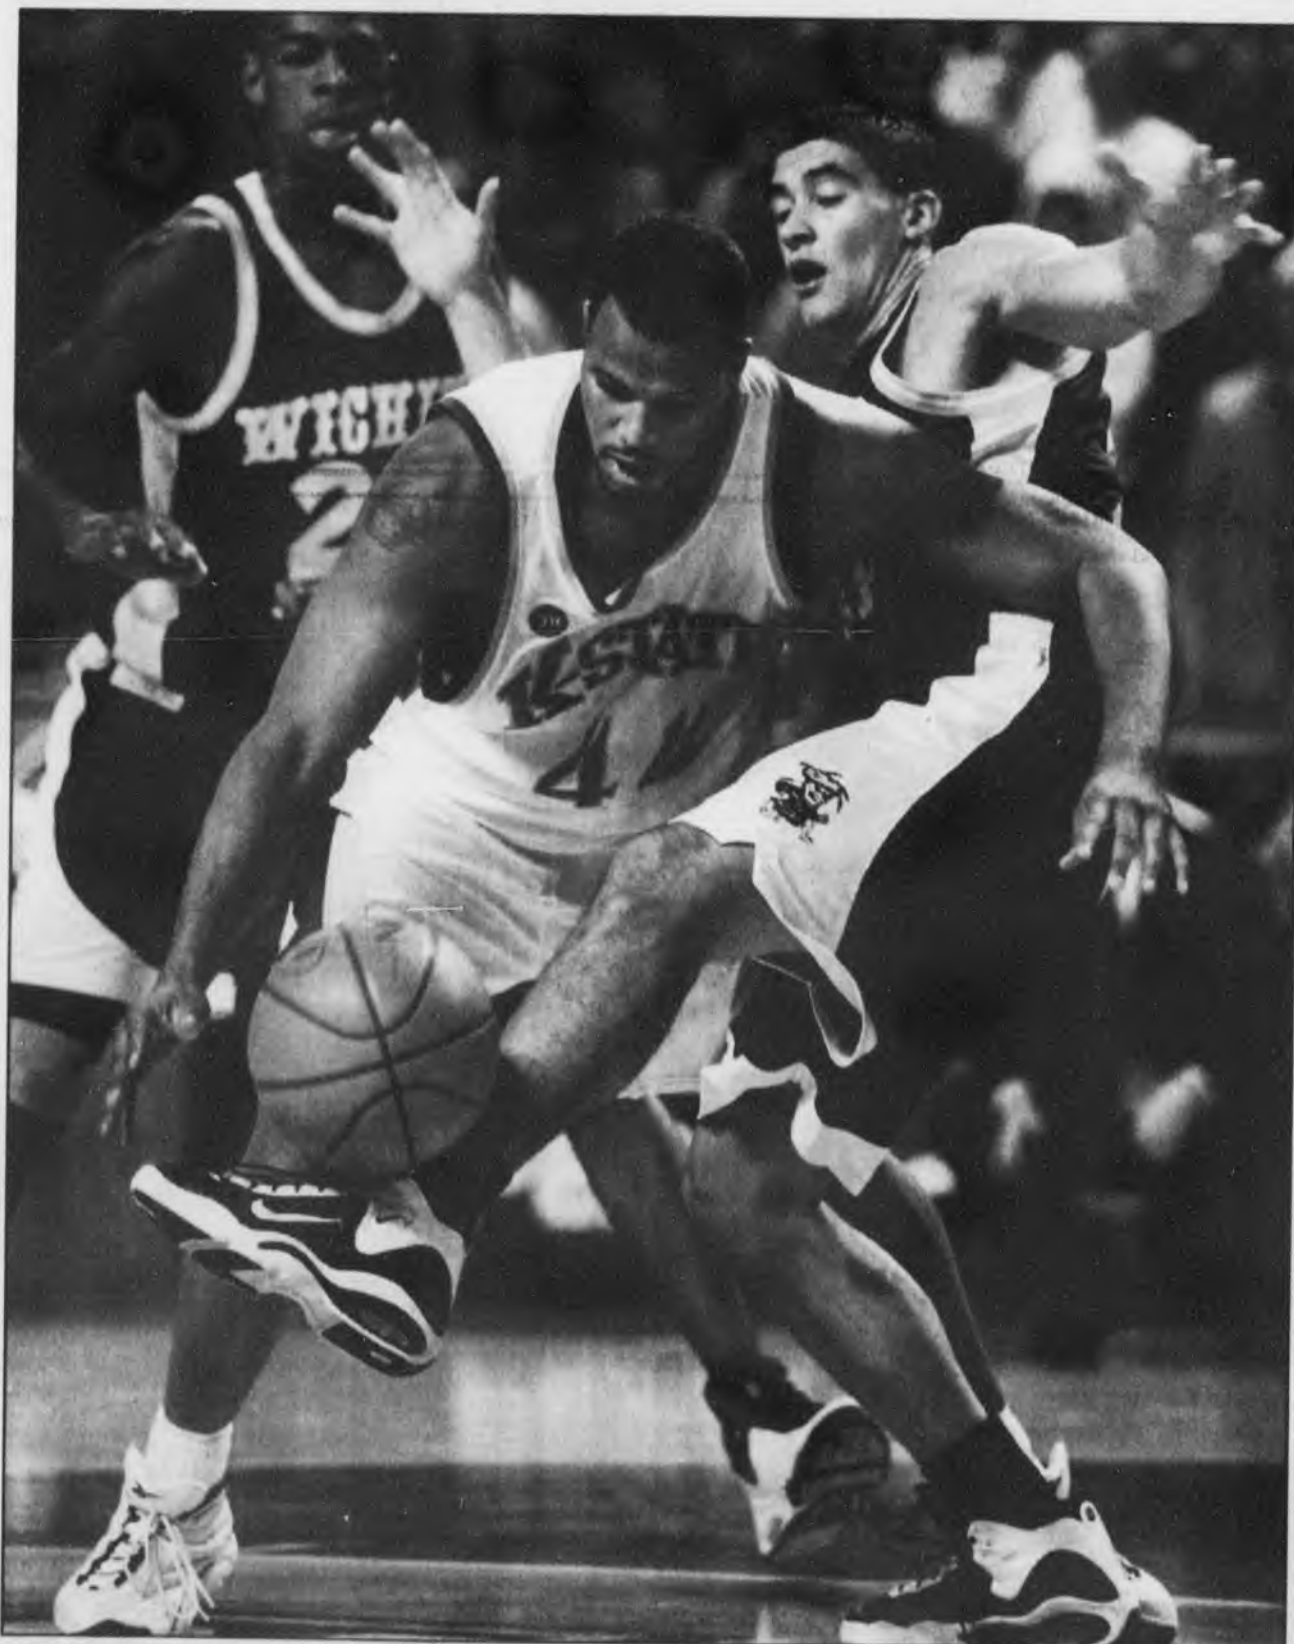

"We would like to think that we could score and defend inside on anybody."

Asbury said the game was won by the Cat's aggressive play and never-give-up defensive attitude. He said the intensity was a factor as well.

"The game was kind of won on the defensive end," Asbury said. "We held them to 34-percent shooting. I don't know if our defense can take all the credit for that. That's about where we're holding people for the year."

"We knew we had to beat them on the boards. We're not bigger than they are. That's a big, thick team. They've got some big kids. So I was pleased that we really got after the boards," Asbury said.

"It was a good effort. It's the first time since I've been here that we've come close to matching Wichita State's intensity."

Wichita State's Jason Perez (right) kicks the basketball while fighting for position with K-State's Ty Sims during first-half action Tuesday night in Bramlage Coliseum. K-State defeated Wichita State 64-47.

Stoops brothers, Venables go way of Barry Switzer — this tragedy could hurt Cats in 2 years

VIEWPOINT

BALMER

After the anguish under the Arch this past weekend and the subsequent big bowl snub, K-State football received another blow Tuesday when head coach Bill Snyder announced what many expected: Defensive coordinator and assistant head coach Mike Stoops will depart for the University of Oklahoma to join his brother Bob's staff after the Cats' appearance in the Alamo Bowl.

This might seem harsh enough, but a week this painful wouldn't be complete without another setback. Also making the trip to Norman, Okla., is linebackers coach Brent Venables, who has built the nation's best linebacking core in Jeff Kelly, Travis Ochs and Mark Simoneau. Venables was the heir apparent to Stoops' position before deciding to join him at OU.

Within four days, the Cats lost a chance at the national championship, a New Year's Day bowl appearance and two key contributors to, arguably, the nation's top defense (minus the passing aspect, of course).

Where does this leave K-State? Not on life support but not exactly in the prime-time penthouse for which the team had hoped.

The biggest mystery in this coaching change is Venables. Not to say his choice to join the Sooners' staff was wrong, but Venables is a Kansas man. The 5A defensive player-of-the-year at Salina South, he spent time at Garden City Community College before becoming a Cat in 1991, where he earned honorable-mention All-Big Eight Conference selection his senior year as a linebacker.

After six years on Snyder's staff, Venables departs for a land K-State fans have despised for generations. It's hard to comprehend that, after decades of suffering humiliation at the hands of the Sooners, the Cats can rise up to defeat their foe, then watch some of purple power's finest leave to try and rebuild the nemesis from Norman.

In a bittersweet season, this is the hardest to swallow. It's good to see products of the K-State system prosper and secure elite coaching positions, but how easily can a fan applaud that promotion when it's supplied by the rival?

Before this decision turns into a guest appearance for Venables and Stoops on "The Jerry Springer Show" segment "My coaches are sleeping with the enemy," the issue at hand for K-State is finding a defensive coordinator.

Defensive line coach Mo Latimore has the credentials, serving on the K-State coaching staff on and off for nearly 10 years. Beyond this, the shelves seem empty. Defensive ends coach Jon Fabris has served under Snyder for only two seasons after coming from Notre Dame in 1997.

Never one to speculate, Snyder failed to mention any coaches K-State was looking at to fill the position, but you can bet the search is under way. In the Stoops brothers, Snyder never missed a beat on establishing a solid defense. The two crafted units that could line up against any opposition. That's primarily the reason

Bob Stoops was lured to Florida two seasons ago and earned a national title.

Now, the men who engineered the Lynch Mob have traded their purple headsets in for a spot on the Sooner Schooner and another shot at rebuilding.

Do we salute them for a job well done? Definitely. But after that, there's not a lot of love to offer men who have gone the way of Barry Switzer. When the enemy's down, it hurts twice as bad to see your people try to resuscitate the opposition. Especially when you consider the team they might have waiting for K-State in two seasons.

BREAK

Academic Affairs Committee chairman.

The spring schedule change is new to this year's proposal.

"We need to look at the entire year and how we can increase student's learning," Student Body President Tracey Mann said.

By creating breaks in each semester, Mann said students would increase their learning capabilities.

"I think you would learn more in a semester by chopping it up," Mann said.

If spring classes began on the Monday before the King holiday, rather than Thursday, the last day of classes also would be sooner. Mann said many faculty members and students are not in favor of beginning class on Thursday for a two-day week in the spring.

Classes probably would begin earlier in the summer if the two-day October break were implemented. With the current system, there are 76 class days in the fall and 75 in the spring.

Mann said the plan would give students and faculty members a needed break.

"The faculty members get tired and could use a change of pace to grade papers and catch up, too," he said.

One of Student Senate's priorities in the spring will be to research the issue and present its findings to Faculty Senate. Rahman said she hopes there is more to the issue than just students who want another break.

"We need to have an understanding of what is to be attained," she said. "I think if they want a vacation because we haven't had one in a while, that would be a little harder to sell."

The idea initially involved a fall break and a reading day — a day without classes the Friday before final exams each semester.

The reading day proposal later was dropped.

Trujillo said Student Senate has a lot more work to put into the proposal before presenting to Faculty Senate.

"At the point it's at right now it's just a theory and an idea," Trujillo said. "In the spring we will hammer out the details and present a specific plan."

Pending approval by Faculty Senate — which could vote on the issue as early as spring — and the regents, the changes most likely would take effect in fall 2000.

"In my opinion, not enough thinking has gone into making it sellable to the regents and the faculty," Rahman said. "If you say you want to cut the time we have in class, that's not going to fly."

candidates to replace the departing coaches, although he said the process of contacting replacements had begun. Although disappointed by the loss of the two coaches, Snyder expressed optimism for the future of the defense.

"We've had similar situations that have taken place, and we've always ended up on our feet," he said. "I'd like to think that will take place again."

him for that."

"He's a great coach, and a good friend, too," Simoneau said. "It's rare to have that kind of relationship."

site just west of the Derby Complex.

Garcia said he will admit the project, with a $300,000 budget, was not a big money-maker, but it was a design challenge that presented more intangible social aspects than most buildings. Coming from a family of Mexican descent, Garcia said he understands the value of culture and the experience of bringing different cultures together.

The addition is tucked on the east side of the existing center, with a large expanse of glass to the north facing Claflin Road. Students not looking for it might be in store for a bit of a surprise.

"That is a much different building than anything we've built on campus in the last 10 years," said Jerry Carter, university architect and director of facilities planning. "It's worth campus people's time to swing by and look at the building."

tive and support-staff offices, thus freeing up space in the original building for more activities for international students. Each office is adjacent via glass doors to a large, sloped-ceiling common area that culminates in the northeast corner with a dramatic full-height glass wall. Because the building sits in the side of a gentle slope, normal-height windows open up to ground level.

"The offices don't seem to be dark little boxes," Carter said. "It is a dramatic departure from anything else that has been done on this campus."

Garcia architects also developed a master plan for the center that will be developed as funding materializes.

a break. "I think the facts are very troubling."

Ready by all accounts to muscle through at least one article of impeachment by week's end, GOP lawmakers bore in with questions relating to allegations that Clinton lied under oath about Lewinsky and thus committed perjury.

Rep. Howard Coble, R-N.C., said Clinton has testified he never touched Lewinsky in a sexual way, yet she testified to the contrary.

"Do you have any opinion ... as to who's lying, because it seems inevitable one of those parties has lied?" Coble asked Craig, special counsel to the president.

"The president ... has testified about that kind of activity, and I accept his word about that," Craig said. He added "It's an oath-on-oath, he says she says situation."

Outside the committee room came the first indication that the White House campaign to build support among GOP moderates might be bearing fruit. Congressional sources, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Republican Rep. Arno Houghton of New York would announce today he opposes impeachment and favors censure of the president.

Houghton, who does not sit on the Judiciary Committee, is among the moderate Republicans whom the White House and Democrats hope can be persuaded to reject impeachment should the matter reach the House floor.

Clinton's allies were hoping that Houghton could show the way to others from New York, including Reps. Rick Lazio, Ben Gilman, Michael Forbes and Jack Quinn.

Under the direction of the committee's chairman, Rep. Henry Hyde, the Judiciary Committee's staff has begun drafting articles of impeachment accusing Clinton of perjury, obstruction of justice and abuse of power. Committee votes are expected beginning Friday.

Public Speaking II students present proposals

By LYNETTE ABITZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State students have issues with the campus that sometimes are left unchanged. Public Speaking II students presented their campus issues Tuesday and asked for student response.

Phil Anderson, professor of speech, had his students present their speeches about a fall break, improving crosswalks, returning to the old enrollment process, improving the K-State rifle-range safety and returning basketball to Ahearn Field House.

Anderson said the annual event serves as an opportunity for students to publicize their issues so changes can occur.

"Change does occur," Anderson said. "Sometimes faster than slower. We just try to prod change."

Anderson also said students often think they don't affect change, but the class shows them they do. Anderson said student input played a large part in keeping Nichols Hall instead of turning it into a parking lot after it was gutted by fire in 1968. He said that event should motivate students to take a stand.

Megan Evans, sophomore in business administration, decided to speak about a fall break. Evans said information from Oklahoma State University and Southern Methodist University showed improvement in class attendance with a fall break.

She also said Faculty Senate turned down Student Senate's proposal for a reading day before finals week and a four-day weekend break because they were confused about whether classes would start two days earlier.

She said they were negotiating for raises and didn't want to look as if they were giving themselves a vacation. They thought there was no need for a day break because of the weekend before finals week, and students would use the fall break as recreational days instead of studying, Evans said.

Quincy Wiley, junior in marketing, presented an idea to add flashing lights at the intersection of Manhattan Avenue and Claflin Road. Unlike the current flashing lights on Manhattan Avenue, Wiley proposed lights that only would flash when a pedestrian pushes the button.

"Students run into the intersection playing a dangerous game of Frogger," he said.

Wiley said K-State Police and the Riley County Police Department supported his idea, and he proposed students sign a petition he planned to present to the university and city.

The new enrollment process affected Nicole Bindel, sophomore in finance, and caused her to propose a return to the old enrollment system. Bindel used her friend's enrollment experience to illustrate how the alphabetical system hurt those who had more hours than other students who enrolled before them. Bindel said she found the KATS system to be effective but thought the system didn't award students for their hard work. Student Senate proposed Bindel's idea, and she had a thank-you letter to them for students to sign.

Safety concerns with the K-State ROTC rifle range persuaded Matt Schneider, sophomore in business administration, to push for change. Schneider used pictures of the range to show it is poorly arranged and is a potential risk to students. He said bullets can ricochet off the walls and other areas and hit students.

"If the bullet has the force to come back at you, it can hurt you," he said.

Schneider said he had talked to officials regarding the problem, and a safety warning had been issued to students.

Paul Gunja, junior in marketing, and Jeff Pelton, sophomore in marketing, required crowd participation for their speech about bringing K-State basketball back to Ahearn Field House. Gunja and Pelton wanted to show the audience that Ahearn has better acoustics than Bramlage Coliseum, is closer for students and statistically has had better results.

Gunja and Pelton proposed an annual memorial Jack Hartman basketball game in Ahearn and asked students to sign a letter they had written to Max Urick, K-State athletic director.

Sara Urbauer, sophomore in business and a student in Anderson's class, said she enjoyed the speeches and thought the class is good for students.

"I think it's a good leadership role," she said. "It gets you out in the open and involved with the campus."

Opera Series

The Texaco-Metropolitan Opera International Radio Network broadcasts weekly performances of the Metropolitan Opera. The 1998-99 season began Saturday. Here is the schedule for December and January:

Dec. 12 — Carmen (Bizet)
Dec. 19 — La Traviata (Verdi)
Dec. 26 — Die Zauberflöte (Mozart)
Jan. 2 — Die Fledermaus (Strauss)
Jan. 9 — Káťa Kabanová (Janáček)
Jan. 16 — Lucia di Lammermoor (Donizetti)
Jan. 23 — Werther (Massenet)
Jan. 30 — La Bohème (Puccini)

The Texaco-Metropolitan Opera International Radio Network can be heard on KHCN-FM 89.5 out of Salina, Kan.

A complete calendar of the broadcast season can be found at www.metopera.org

The Metropolitan Opera has made live opera accessible to the masses for 58 years.

The Texaco-Metropolitan Opera International Radio Network brings professional opera into living rooms across the United States and to Puerto Rico, Canada, Europe and Australia.

The 1998-99 broadcast season began Saturday with Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro" and continues through April 17, 1999, with Handel's "Giulio Cesare."

This week's performance is Bizet's "Carmen," the story of a gypsy and her jealous lover, Don José.

After "Carmen," the season continues with Verdi's "La Traviata" and Mozart's "Die Zauberflöte."

"The first four operas are standards of operatic repertoire," said Reginald Pittman, assistant professor of music and opera instructor, who occasionally listens to the broadcasts.

Pittman said for those not familiar with opera, he recommends the fifth broadcast in the series, "Die Fledermaus," on Jan. 2.

"It has a funny storyline and up-tempo music," he said. "It's probably the most famous Viennese operetta."

He said the festive "Fledermaus" is a popular performance around New Year's Eve, because even over the airwaves, the pageantry of its second-act party scene shines.

"The second act can have stars that have nothing to do with the rest of the opera," he said. "We could use Bill Snyder, and the butler would announce, 'Now presenting Lord Snyder,' and he would walk in."

Pittman said students might be familiar with Strauss' "Die Fledermaus" because KSU Opera Theatre performed it in March 1997.

Two 20th-century operas will run in February, and on April 3, the American opera "Susannah," by Carlisle Floyd, will depart from the waltzes and sword fights typical of European performances.

"It's a nice opera, light in nature, and obviously it speaks of our country," he said of the performance set in the Great Smoky Mountains. "One of the songs is called 'Ain't it a pretty night,' so it's not like other operas."

Pittman said "Susannah" will have ties to Kansas. Samuel Ramey, who plays the role of Olin Blitch, is from Colby, Kan.

Timothy Bonnell, senior in voice performance and president and founder of Kansas State University Opera Guild, said he tries to pass out schedules for the performance series at the beginning of each season.

He said the weekly broadcasts from the Metropolitan Opera are a fantastic opportunity to hear some of the best opera performances today.

"What they'll be hearing is the crème de la crème in the world of opera performance," Bonnell said. "It's the most elite opera house in the world."

Soap-opera star dies of Lou Gehrig's Disease

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Michael Zaslow, an Emmy-winning soap-opera star who portrayed a victim of Lou Gehrig's Disease on "One Life to Live" after being stricken with the illness in real life, has died of the disease. He was 54.

Zaslow, who died Sunday at his home in New York City, won a Daytime Emmy in 1994 as best actor for his role as the villainous Roger Thorpe on CBS' "Guiding Light." After portraying Thorpe for 25 years, he was fired from the show last year with his health in doubt.

He re-emerged this year on ABC's "One Life to Live," reviving the character of David Renaldi, whom he played from 1983 to 1986. Like Zaslow, Renaldi had Lou Gehrig's Disease, or Amyotrophic Lateral Sclerosis, was in a wheelchair and could "speak" only by typing words into a voice synthesizer.

He said he was using his role to raise awareness about the degenerative nervous-system disorder. He also founded the ALS organization ZazAngels.

"I am blessed with my celebrity like Chris Reeve," he said in an interview last spring. "So I and my family and extended family have ways to raise this disease to eye level."

Kristie Miller, a 24-year-old fan of "Guiding Light," led an unsuccessful Internet petition drive against the show's owners, Procter & Gamble Co., to try to bring Zaslow back after he was fired. She said she believed he was treated unfairly.

"ABC saw not his disability but his ability," she said. "He still could act. It wasn't a problem. They welcomed him to the set. He brought their level of acting up."

House Speaker Newt Gingrich, who met with Zaslow in May to discuss increasing federal funding for medical research, said the actor demonstrated uncommon strength and determination. "His commitment served as a testament to his own courage and to the perseverance of the human spirit," Gingrich said.

Zaslow's final appearance on "One Life to Live" was taped Oct. 30 and broadcast Dec. 1. His character and others were discussing holiday plans.

It's not sure how Zaslow's death will be dealt with on the show, spokeswoman Sallie Schoneboom said. Daytime soaps are taped about three weeks in advance.

In addition to his soap-opera work, Zaslow appeared in the movie "You Light Up My Life" and the TV series "Law & Order." He also appeared in the Broadway productions "Cat on a Hot Tin Roof," "Fiddler on the Roof," "Onward Victoria" and "Boccaccio."

He is survived by his wife, Susan Hufford, and two daughters.

2nd verse, same as the 1st Jewel's sophomore release mirrors debut

By SARAH FLORIE

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Alaska native Jewel shows us a more mature side of her music with the release of her new album, "Spirit," while keeping with the traditional folk-ballad style of her first album, 1994's "Pieces of You."

The first single from this 13-song collection, "Hands," is classic Jewel. It has all the makings of a No. 1 song with its mixture of delicate guitar and a relatively strong baseline.

The same goes for the song "Down So Long," which is a more sassy form of Jewel — Jewel with an attitude.

If you could say only one thing about this album, it would have to be that it is an acoustic-lover's dream.

Although she received fame for her earlier folk ballads, it might be to Jewel's advantage to expand her horizons just a tad. With the exception of a few songs, it's sometimes hard to tell one whisperlike tune from another.

Compare Jewel's "Spirit" with say, Tori Amos' "From the Choirgirl Hotel," and you'll see a much stronger musician in Tori Amos. Amos is clearly a musician with a strong voice, a distinctive style and musical expressiveness.

After listening to "Spirit" three or four times, however, I had no choice but to get used to it, and therefore, favor it a little more than I did at first. A word of caution — you'd better be a fan of high-pitched, breathy female voices to purchase this one.

I can say one thing with confidence, however. Jewel fanatics who were big fans of her first album will enjoy "Spirit" equally as well.

Selected concerts to be broadcast

Kansas State Orchestra, K-State Choirs chosen for broadcast on public radio.

By AMANDA EWING
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sergei Prokofiev composed "Peter and the Wolf" as a musical tale to entertain children. The story of young Peter catching the wolf by the tail is told with each character, including a bird, a cat, a duck, and, of course, Peter and the wolf, represented by different instruments.

The Kansas State Orchestra and the K-State choirs introduce new generations to such classic compositions and songs as "Peter and the Wolf" through their concerts, and public radio is spreading the music to even more listeners than can fill McCain Auditorium.

Radio Kansas, the public radio service of Kansas, records many of the orchestra's and choir's concerts. The selected concerts are broadcast on three stations in Manhattan, Wichita and Hays.

Tim Kimble, operations director for Radio Kansas, said selected recordings are broadcast depending on what will be played or sung.

The next broadcast of K-State talent will feature the Kansas State Choir, Kansas State Chorale and the Rhapsody Ringers, K-State's bell choir. The broadcast will be Dec. 20.

Bethany College and Friends University also have many of their concerts recorded, Kimble said. If funding increases, more schools eventually might be added.

Kimble said schools are selected based on the quality of their programs and performances. K-State's programs have been recorded for the past six to eight years.

Even though the concerts are heard by hundreds of people, that doesn't make the orchestra members nervous, Jonathan Szeto, senior in computer science, said.

"You're playing for people anyway, so it doesn't matter if they're listening on the radio or in the audience," he said.

David Littrell, orchestra conductor and professor of music, said he often gets comments from listeners around the state who have heard the broadcasts.

Members of the orchestra said it's nice for those not in Manhattan to have the opportunity to hear the performance.

"It's nice for people to be able to hear it, especially parents who can't make it," Becky Jacobs, senior in management, said.

Rod Walker, conductor of the choral activities, said the broadcasts, especially of the Christmas concerts, are a nice way to kick off the holiday season. He also said they're a good way to showcase the students' talent.

"It recognizes the students' efforts and what they're capable of doing," he said.

Mock interviews benefit both students, employers with preparation for future

By LAURAN COWDREY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students will have the opportunity to practice their job interviewing skills during the College of Arts and Sciences' mock interviews on Jan. 26.

A variety of company representatives have volunteered to be the interviewers, said Tim Henderson, assistant director of Career and Employment Services. Each session is set up with a 20-minute interview and a 10-minute critique session.

"Both the students and the employers go into this as an educational experience," Henderson said. "It is the old cliché — practice makes perfect."

Henderson said many students have interviewed for part-time jobs, but the process is usually informal. Mock interviews allow students a chance to participate in a formal interview process.

Students who sign up are encouraged to do background research on the company they will meet with, to gain knowledge and form questions about the subject.

Students also are requested to have a résumé prepared, said Roger Trenary, instructor of economics and member of the Mock Interview Coordinating Committee for the College of Arts and Sciences.

"It is an advantage for people to get going on their résumé," he said. "It pays to have a résumé prepared."

Trenary said the mock interviews are for students of any age, whether they are job searching or applying to graduate or law school.

The most important factor is that it gives students formal interviewing techniques, he said.

"It is hard for someone to go in cold," Trenary said. "This gives our students an ability to get a job."

This is only the second year for mock interviews, but the response from students and employers has been positive, Henderson said.

"The response has been tremendous," he said.

Twelve companies will be present at the mock interviews because of the variety of majors in the College of Arts and Sciences, Henderson said.

"We have a variety of diverse companies because the college is so diverse," he said.

Among the companies represented will be Anderson Consulting, Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City, Kaw Valley Center, Raytheon, Sprint and the 8th Judicial Court Services.

Students in the College of Arts and Sciences who are interested in mock interviews should sign up in Holtz Hall, Jan. 20-22. Résumés are required to sign up.

Committee draws up 4 articles of impeachment

By DAVID ESPO

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — In a historic drama played out in the shadow of the Capitol, Republicans on the House Judiciary Committee drew up four articles of impeachment Wednesday against President Clinton. All stem from his sexual relationship with Monica Lewinsky and long campaign to cover it up.

Republicans cited Clinton on two counts of perjury, one count of obstruction of justice and one of abuse of power. Each, they said, amounted to high crimes and misdemeanors, the impeachment standard established by the Founding Fathers in the Constitution more than two centuries ago.

Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., the panel's chairman, vowed to press for a vote by week's end.

White House counsel Charles F.C. Ruff was still laying out the president's defense, fielding pointed questions from committee Republicans, when GOP aides released the working draft of their proposed articles "Impeaching William Jefferson Clinton."

Ruff urged legislators to abandon their move toward impeachment, saying Clinton's "conduct, although morally reprehensible, does not warrant impeachment, does not warrant overturning the mandate of the American electorate."

Counts include abuse of power, obstruction of justice, perjury

Committee Democrats countered the GOP articles of impeachment with a draft proposal to censure Clinton, citing him for "reprehensible conduct with a subordinate," Lewinsky, and demanding his signature on the instrument of his censure.

"No person is above the law, and the president remains subject to criminal and civil penalties for this conduct," the Democratic proposal says. It does not accuse Clinton of perjury, nor does it demand he pay a fine for his transgressions.

Committee approval of any of the four articles of impeachment would set the stage for a vote in the House next week, thus making Clinton only the second president in American history to suffer the humiliation of an impeachment roll call on the floor of Congress.

President Andrew Johnson was impeached in the House, then acquitted in a Senate trial by a single vote in 1868.

A third president, Richard Nixon, resigned in 1974 rather than face certain impeachment in the House during Watergate.

Unlike Nixon, though, Clinton retains high approval ratings in the polls and strong support among lawmakers of his own party — potent weapons for the battle ahead.

Increasingly, he and his aides were bidding for the support of 30 or so moderate Republicans who will hold the balance of power in the House. One GOP lawmaker, Rep. Amo Houghton of New York, declared his opposition to impeachment during the day, and the White House signaled a willingness to consider any and all proposals that don't include impeachment.

Short of impeachment, "we are open to any reasonable suggestion from any side as a way of finding an end to this," Ruff told the Judiciary Committee in one of several officially-sanctioned comments, inviting a lesser punishment.

One Democrat, Rep. Martin Meehan of Massachusetts, called on Clinton to make a fresh apology in a nationally-televised appearance.

The first GOP draft article says Clinton "willfully provided perjurious, false and misleading testimony" to Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr's grand jury last summer when it was investigating his relationship with Lewinsky.

Sedimentation at Tuttle Creek Reservoir forced the closure of four parks on the lake. Sediment is encroaching on flood control areas, reducing the flood control capacity of the reservoir.

Principle tributaries draining into reservoir

There are three principle tributaries that drain into Tuttle Creek reservoir. Of the three, only one, Black Vermillion, resides completely within Kansas state lines. The other two reside primarily in Nebraska. Figures are based on 1997 data.

Tributary	Watershed (%)	Atrazine (lbs.)	Loading (%)
Big Blue	49.6	7327.1	69.7
Little Blue	34.5	2654.3	25.2
Black Vermillion	4.3	533.9	5.1

Sedimentation creeps forward at reservoir

Optimists might say Tuttle Creek Reservoir is more than half empty. Pessimists would argue it nearly is half full.

However, no one denies it is filling.

Paul Weidhaas, park ranger for Tuttle Creek Reservoir, said Army Corps of Engineers estimates from 1983 predicted 61 percent of the reservoir's volume would be left by 2000 and 25 percent by 2035.

Weidhaas said although the filling hasn't been that drastic, the silt and soil still have been coming in, particularly where water flows slowly enough for those particles to drop from the water.

Four federal parks in the northern end of the reservoir closed between 1974 and 1982 when boat ramps silted in, Weidhaas said.

Michael Bart, chief of planning and hydrology for the Corps of Engineers, said his figures suggest the problem isn't the amount coming in, it's been the location.

When the reservoir was constructed by the corps in 1962, it had a total volume of 2,346,000 acre feet (a unit containing enough water to fill an acre of land to a depth of one foot; a flood control volume of 1,933,000 acre feet; and a multiple use area of 413,000 acre feet, with 228,000 acre feet devoted to sediment storage, Bart said.

Measurements taken after the flood of 1993 show a remaining volume of about 2,203,000 acre feet, a loss of 143,000 acre feet to sedimentation or 4,600 per year since it opened, he said.

The loss is within 5 to 10 percent of earlier sedimentation estimates, but only half of the sediment is going to its intended sediment pool, with the rest ending up in the flood control pool, Bart said.

"It's not just encroaching, it's being deposited in both areas," Bart said. "We're losing flood control at the same time."

Officials could lower the reservoir level to restore flood capacity, but other resources, such as fishing, wetland habitats and state water supplies, would suffer, he said.

"Balancing project purposes will be more challenging as the decades go by," he said. "The folks that follow us will have some hard choices to make."

These days, Fancy Creek State Park and Randolph State Park likely would be next on the closed list with dry land at the north ends, Weidhaas said.

On the other hand, strong local support from nearby communities like Randolph have kept the parks far from abandoned

Tuttle cited for high atrazine levels

Recent studies have state, federal and university scientists pondering exactly what is coming into Tuttle Creek Reservoir and how to keep it out.

Last April, Tuttle Creek Reservoir was on a list of 303 impaired lakes submitted to the Environmental Protection Agency, said Tom Stiles, chief of prevention and planning for the Division of Environment in the Kansas Department of Health and Environment.

Specifically, the reservoir was cited for levels of atrazine, a broadleaf pest control; alachlor, a grass herbicide; and sedimentation above standards mandated by the Clean Water Act.

"We've known for a long time about elevated atrazine levels," Stiles said. "It comes, and it goes. Now we're getting serious about it."

KDHE is trying to determine the contaminant source before submitting a plan of action to the EPA this summer.

Stiles said current levels in the reservoir are uncertain due to fluctuations throughout the year.

"We just need to dive into the data and see what it means," he said.

Phil Barnes, research engineer with the Department of Biological and Agricultural Engineering and K-State extension teams have made a point of finding out how much atrazine has been coming in on the Tuttle watershed as well as its sources.

Enrollment up from same time last year

■ 61 more students are enrolled, enrollment still occurring on KATS.

By JAMI STUMP
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State is seeing an increase in spring enrollment for next semester.

Enrollment for spring 1999 has increased by 61 students compared to enrollment figures at this time last year.

Registrar Don Foster said this increase is in comparison to last year's spring enrollment of 15,499 students.

John Fairman, assistant vice president of institutional advancement, said one has to compare apples to apples when looking at spring enrollment.

"You have to look at a point in time, not compare semesters to show increases or decreases in enrollment," Fairman said.

Naturally, it appears there is a lower enrollment figure when comparing spring semesters to their fall counterparts, but Foster said spring semester enrollment is normally 6 to 7 percent lower than that of the fall semester.

"We have a December graduating class that leaves with no high school and few junior college enrollments," Fairman said. "You just don't have an influx of students, so you see those numbers drop."

For the spring semester, K-State normally has 400-500 new students enroll, Foster said.

Foster said he is pleased with the number of students who enrolled during the regular enrollment period. Students still can enroll via K-State Access Technology System (KATS) until the spring semester starts.

"Everyday 20 to 30 students enroll on KATS," Foster said. "There are still class sections that are open and available to students."

Intercession provides students opportunity to vary experiences

■ Classes offered during winter intercession not always typical.

By SUZANNE WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If students are looking for a fun class that can be taken in three weeks or fewer, intercession might provide the answer.

Thirty-nine classes will be offered during the January 1999 intercession. Most are not offered at any other time of the year, and some might not be offered again.

"There's such an interesting array of courses," said Suzanne Knorr, program coordinator for intercession and other programs. "It gives students the opportunity to do something they might not have done otherwise."

Knorr said there are a variety of reasons students might take a course offered during an intercession; most of them take it for fun.

Jennifer McCallum, junior in biology and pre-veterinary medicine, is one of these students. She has taken two intercession courses in fantasy literature and Shakespeare films.

"They were fun," McCallum said. "However, it was kind of annoying going every single night for three hours, and there was a lot to get done, but I learned a lot."

Intercession classes can last up to three weeks, depending on the number of credit hours that are offered for the course. Most classes meet Monday through Friday for at least three hours or more.

"It's not designed to be fluff at all; it's very rigorous," Knorr said.

William Winslow, professor in landscape architecture, said he agreed. Winslow is teaching an inter-

Faculty asked for aid in scholarship drive

KSU Foundation continues to tap resources to raise money for student scholarships. This month, the scholarship committee is sending out a mailing to faculty to gain support for the academic-scholarship campaign.

"Faculty are as committed as anyone," said Richard Pearson, national chairman for scholarship campaign. "This gives them a chance to participate for their college."

Kirk Baughan, director of special campaigns with KSU Foundation, said he is pleased with the success of the fund-raising efforts since the beginning of the campaign. The campaign as of November is above the half-way mark with $29.4 million.

The fund raising started July 1, 1996, and will end June 30, 2000. Baughan said he hopes to actually reach the goal of $50 million in early spring 2000.

"We have a lot of momentum. We feel really good, but we still have a lot of work to do," Baughan said.

Baughan said it is important to allow the opportunity for faculty to participate because they have personal interest. He said each college has a campaign committee and volunteers who are devoted to reaching the fund-raising goal.

"If they (faculty) believe in the program, then they can convince other people to also contribute," he said.

Along with the mailings to faculty, fund-raising support continues with contacting K-State alumni.

Pearson said targets for the campaign were older alumni in the beginning, and now the target is new graduates.

"Our goal is communicating with alumni around the world and trying to get them to make a pledge to the campaign," he said.

Pearson said the scholarship committee has a tough job, but it definitely has been rewarding. He said it has been an exciting chance to meet a lot of K-State alumni around the world.

"I found out that it is a funny group here at K-State," he said. "We hang together and we are a committed group — and it has carried over in the campaign."

Students receive fee deadlines via e-mail

The university cashiers office is taking a new approach to informing students about fee payment this year. For the first time, the office is e-mailing students to inform them about deadlines for payments in addition to sending out the usual tuition bills.

"This is an effort to inform the students," assistant controller Doug Ackley said.

He said the e-mail will inform students that bills were sent out and that they are due at the cashiers office by Jan. 5.

Additionally, the message also gives resources for students wanting more information about the new tax credits available for students and their families. The message offers an e-mail address and phone number where students can order the IRS publication "970, Tax Benefits for Higher Education." Students can find the publication at the IRS World Wide Web site, www.irs.gov, or can order it by calling 1-800-TAX FORM.

The third part to the e-mail message is to inform students that if they or their parents want tax credit for spring 1999 tuition credited to tax year 1998, they need to send their tuition payments to the cashiers office before Dec. 23.

"This is the first year for e-mail," Ackley said. "We just got the ability to do this, and we are sending the messages out in stages because we don't want to lock up the system."

Some students who already have received their e-mail say this is a great idea.

"It's good, because it'll help me remember to pay my bill," Katie Meisinger, sophomore in art education, said.

All K-State students should have their messages by tomorrow evening at the latest, Ackley said.

Special holiday meal planned for students

Residence hall dining centers will offer a total dining experience on Thursday.

The dining centers will have a special holiday meal and will decorate the dining centers according to the Impressionist period with the official theme, "Holiday Impression."

The event is part of a residence hall program that plans and provides special theme meals for residents and guests. The dinner is a unique opportunity for students to relax before finals, said Michael Testagrossa, assistant manager of Derby Food Center.

"The meal gives students a chance to celebrate the holidays with their friends in their living environment," he said. "It adds to the atmosphere for the students that live there."

All three dining centers jointly coordinate the holiday meal, and thousands of staff hours have been invested in the event since planning began in July, Testagrossa said.

"The staff puts a lot of hard work and pride into the meal," he said. "It gives them a chance to show off what they can do."

Students benefit from the enhanced dining experience, said Joe Ashley, resident assistant for Haymaker Hall and senior in mass communications.

"It makes students feel more at home, especially freshmen who are missing out on a lot of the holiday preparations at home," he said. "It provides them with a little taste of home."

The holiday meal, which is Thursday from 4:50 to 7 p.m., is not limited to students in the residence halls. It is open to the public for $6.25 per person. Reservations can be made by calling a dining center by noon on Thursday.

The dinner will be an enjoyable experience for anyone who attends, Testagrossa said.

"I think most people don't expect the amount of work that goes into the dinner," he said. "People who come gain a new appreciation for residence hall living."

The menu includes prime rib, chicken breast, rack of pork, twice-baked potatoes, corn, green beans, salad bar, fruit, cheesecake, holiday fruit tart, sugar cookies and ice cream.

Man shot by police suspected of murder

GRANTS PASS, Ore. — A man killed by a Kansas Highway Patrol officer during a drug check on a Greyhound bus was being sought in the death of a friend in Oregon, authorities there said Wednesday.

Josephine County, Ore., authorities said Emmanuel J. Clapp, 27, died Monday in a quick exchange of gunfire with a highway patrol officer on the bus.

Kansas authorities have not officially identified Clapp. However, Josephine County sheriff's deputies said he was the prime suspect in the disappearance last September of Matthew R. Fallon, who was killed near Cave Junction, Ore.

Oregon authorities learned of Clapp's death on Tuesday as they were digging up a grave in the back yard of his Cave Junction home. Detective Sgt. Ron Goodpasture said the body found there is believed to be Fallon's.

About 20 bus riders watched Monday as Clapp scuffled with two state troopers on the bus. Witnesses said Clapp pulled a gun and fired at least once before he was shot.

The bus had stopped in Salina, Kan., Monday for a meal break. The troopers boarded the empty bus with a drug-sniffing dog to check for contraband when they found an empty holster in Clapp's bag. They confronted the man after passengers reboarded.

Goodpasture said the murder case involving Clapp began in late September, when another friend reported Fallon missing.

Detectives soon focused on Clapp and his wife, Brandy. Fallon had lived with the Clapps, and his car, a 1981 Chrysler, was found on their property. Clapp fled the area Sunday.

ARCHITECTURE matters

K-State's architecture, planning process needs more variety, critics say

By RUSSELL FORTMEYER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When the architect was selected for the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art in 1993, Michael McNamara was distraught.

On one hand, this associate professor of architecture had personally helped to develop the comprehensive building program for the competition to design the museum. On the other, he said he felt the selection committee that made the final decision ignored the project's goals and instead picked the competition entry based on looks alone.

In a 1996 interview, McNamara said although he was invited to give input during the selection process, "we were excused from the process at the point where there was a serious difference of opinion."

Looking back at the selection process from 1998, McNamara said he would easily do it again.

"I'm concerned about a pattern of incremental decision making when it comes to campus planning," he said.

The process of selecting an architect is where campus design issues start. The building guidelines and programs given to architects for university projects and the design philosophies the architects bring to campus help form the buildings that are eventually designed.

With no formal master plan, K-State has little in the way of design guidelines other than technical code requirements of the state. The College of Architecture, Planning and Design plays no role in campus design. Some faculty and administrators would say the state's restrictions on the university's selection of potential architects limits the variety of campus design to a few Kansas firms that don't represent the plurality of contemporary architecture.

That view, however, doesn't always find nods of agreement.

"I would like to think the architects in Wichita and Kansas City would be constantly analyzing the architecture of the world and bringing those ideas to their projects every day," President Jon Wefald said.

The president is open to suggestions on how to improve the quality of campus architecture, but he jokes, "You can have raging differences over architecture."

State building procedures restrictive

Many on campus concede what keeps K-State from actively pursuing architects with a larger world view — someone like current architecture stars Richard Meier, Frank Gehry or Rem Koolhaas — is a restrictive state building process and limited funds.

"Maybe it's possible to get the Board of Regents to look into this," Tom Rawson, vice president of administration and finance, said of the architect-selection process. "Right now, we have no leeway."

The building process on campus begins with a project's inclusion on the "Kansas Register" requesting proposals from firms who are registered and physically located in Kansas. However, joint proposals involving both a Kansas firm and an out-of-state firm are allowed.

Hale Library was a joint proposal between Brent Bowman and Associates of Manhattan and Hammond Beeby and Babka Inc. of Chicago. The Beach art museum was designed by Moore/Andersson Architects Inc. of Austin, Texas, and was not held to the state restriction because it was totally built with private money.

Many faculty and Wall Street Journal architecture critic Ada Louise Huxtable think by not being able to hire out-of-state architects on more projects, K-State is settling.

"You've got to go beyond that," Huxtable said. "The minute you cut off anyone but a local architect or alum, you've sabotaged the process. That's not anything against the competence of local architects."

After architects submit proposals, those considered qualified are reviewed by the State Building Advisory Committee, on which either the dean of architecture from K-State or the University of Kansas is represented. The committee shortlists the projects to three to five firms.

Eugene Kremer, professor of architecture and a former member of the advisory committee, said cronyism occasionally infiltrates the committee.

"The recognition of design quality is not that which an architecture critic or a group of architects would concur on," Kremer said. "There's more concern with time, budgets and pork-barreling."

The project then is handed to a negotiating committee consisting of one State Division of Architectural Services representative, one from the Kansas Board of Regents office and one from the university. Anyone is allowed to address the negotiating committee on any issue, but the final decision is made by the three members. The committee

Collegian looks back at fall 1998 semester

Nationally, this year will be remembered as the year that the Wildcats made it to the brink of a national title but couldn't finish the job. For students at K-State, however, there are a number of changes and events this past semester that will be affecting us in other ways.

WELCOME BACK, WILDCATS, (Aug. 24). K-State grouped all of its kickoff events into one week-long, convenient package for the first time this past semester.

K-STATE CAMPUS UNDERGOING HEAVY FALL CONSTRUCTION, (Aug. 26). This semester, the long-awaited renovations to the K-State Student Union and KSU Stadium finally began, and K-State was able to complete construction on the basement of Nichols Hall and the International Student Center. Plans for the near future include expansion of the Hoeflin Stone House, the addition of a biological research facility between Ackert Hall and Military Science Hall and construction of Fiedler Hall.

MURPHY TO MISS FOUR GAMES, (Aug. 27). A gift from an alumnus postponed the debut of running back Frank Murphy and still has the potential to cause some problems for us later.

KJ'S OPENS DOORS TO 18-YEAR-OLDS, (Sept. 1). KJ's became the next bar in Aggieville to allow 18-year-olds inside.

K-STATE FACULTY SALARIES CONTINUE TO FALL BEHIND (Sept. 2). We learned that K-State continued to lose some of its best and brightest professors because of a Kansas trend of paying higher education faculty members less than their counterparts at peer institutions. The Board of Regents is still working on that issue.

LIGHTING STILL BEING IMPROVED AT CAMPUS CROSSWALKS, (Sept. 9). After a history of accidents, North Manhattan Avenue finally was installed with flashing traffic lights and clearly marked crosswalks.

THE QUEST FOR $50 MILLION, (Sept. 21). K-State took a tall order as the Foundation kicked off its drive to raise $50 million in scholarship money.

K-STATE LEADS REGENTS IN ADMISSIONS GROWTH, (Sept. 25). K-State enrollment went up by 3% over last year, by far the largest increase among regents schools.

HOMECOMING WEEK BEGINS, (Oct. 19). This year's Homecoming was the most controversial in recent memory, with the cancellation of the "Paint It Purple" service project and changes to the body building competition because of widespread injuries. Participants in next year's competition will be challenged to rebuild.

CAMPAIGN AD DIDN'T VIOLATE NCAA RULES, (Oct. 27). A political ad with Michael Bishop ignited controversy over whether or not a political endorsement was an NCAA violation.

POLICE INVESTIGATING TWO DEATHS AS POSSIBLE MURDER-SUICIDE, (Oct. 27). Tragedy hit the Little Apple with the murder of fellow K-Stater Thomas Richardson, who was shot and killed in a murder-suicide. It was Manhattan's first homicide since January 1997.

PASSING OF A LEGEND, (Nov. 9). While vacationing in New Mexico, K-State's legendary basketball coach, Jack Hartman, died of apparent heart failure. Hartman was remembered during a service in Ahearn Field House.

OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. The editorial board consists of Collegian editors and other staff members. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

K-State athletic department urged to sue for lost revenue

For more letters to the editor about football, check out the eCollegian at collegian.ksu.edu

Editor,

Nothing can be said to alleviate the pain we all feel regarding the egregious injustice that has been dealt. However, we can attempt to make sure nothing so horrendous happens in the future. The Big 12 Conference and K-State needs to sue the Bowl Championship Series for all of the lost revenue for the exclusion from a more appropriate bowl. K-State also needs to gain some compensation for a potential loss of recruiting that may result. Maybe K-State can be the catalyst for the playoff system that everyone has been demanding for years.

HUSSEIN REFUSES TO BACK DOWN, CLINTON THREATENS INTERVENTION

Saddam Hussein again denied United Nations weapons inspectors access to government installations late yesterday. President Chelsea Clinton warned Hussein of "grave consequences" should the Iraqi leader not comply fully with U.N. resolutions.

The K-State football team brought back the Big XXVI trophy following a 33-7 victory in St. Louis over the Oklahoma Sooners last Saturday. Quarterback C.J. Sullivan remained silent about his Heisman candidacy, but Coach Martin Gramatica said the triumph "delivers the team from the painful memory of getting shafted by the BCS in 1998." Gramatica suffered his fifth heart attack of the season Saturday, immediately after leaping up and down for joy after winning the coin toss, but he was back on his feet for kickoff. The Wildcats await a bowl bid but based on experience, "will probably end up in the Human Express Wok Bowl," Gramatica muttered.

The final unidentified inanimate object in Durland Hall officially was dedicated Friday. The ribbon-cutting celebrating the Travis D. Lenkner Doorknob marks the final object in the building to be dedicated and named for a person. Previous dedications this year have included dedications of the Russell Fortmeyer Doorstop, Schrodinger's Lecture Hall (which might or might not be occupied at any given time; it's hard to tell), the Heisenberg Computer Lab (very hard to locate), and the Michael Bishop Soap Dispenser.

The K-State Student Union expansion finally was finished last weekend. The 33rd story of the Union promptly was destroyed by a low-flying airliner, killing 165 people, but the 45 stories above it promptly fell into place and extinguished the fire. However, Wednesday's meeting of the Tridimensional Chess Club has been moved to the 32nd floor of the Union.

Hale Library is donating a $500,000 to the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

"We want to help them out, in support of all the athletic entertainment they provide to the university," said Brad "Rock Me" Anateus, captain of the K-State Quiz Bowl team that won the NCAA championship televised last night on ESPN47. The funds will be used to buy much-needed uniforms, skates and to provide the Vanier Football Complex with running water for the first time since the accidental meltdown of Ward Hall in 2008.

The new ice age shows no sign of relenting. Since its inception in late 1998, the world has been gripped by subzero weather and near-arctic conditions for years (except the summer of 2011, in which temperatures reached a balmy 50 degrees, a phenomenon attributed to El Niño). Although this catastrophe has caused widespread famine and the obliteration of most Kansas crops, K-State has a winning hockey team for the third-consecutive year.

The K-State astrophysics department's bid to launch a satellite into high orbit failed yesterday when a first-stage booster malfunctioned, sending the craft plunging into the University of Kansas' Memorial Stadium in Lawrence. Nobody was injured, but the building was destroyed.

"It was a tragedy," K-State President Ron Johnson said between snickers, "a sad, sad tragedy." Johnson then collapsed in laughter and was escorted away.

Denison Hall finally was leveled on Thursday to make room for further expansion of Hale Library. The 20th-century classic song "Closing Time" by Semisonic was played as President Johnson pressed the detonation button, destroying the building.

"Perhaps we should have warned them, maybe sent them a memo or something," Johnson mused as a chorus of screams emerged from inside the creaking, collapsing building.

Parking meters on campus now accept ATM cards, an upgrade prompted by the new $30-an-hour parking fee. Parking permits will be $1,500 next semester, or for $400 a semester, students can park in the parking complex on Earth's moon and take the parking shuttle back to Earth.

Three more K-State students won Marshall Scholarships last month, and several more are expected to be announced as nominees for the Truman and Rhodes scholarships.

"We are preserving a tradition of academic excellence that spans a generation," Johnson said. "It's never a front-page story, it's never an easy story to encapsulate. It's still true this university is the best unity of academic resources and economy in the country, that for a public, land-grant university we are second to none, and we shall maintain this tradition through to the 22nd century."

The expansion of Anderson Avenue is scheduled to be completed by next May. And we mean it this time.

Ken Wells still will be a graduate student in English in 2018. You can e-mail him at sigma7@ksu.edu.

Truth, empowerment should remain top priority

VIEWPOINT

Sam Sackett

A goal I have always tried to accomplish is to make my world a little better one step at a time. As an opinion columnist, I have tried to fulfill that goal by being the little red light that flashes SERVICE ENGINE SOON.

While I generally have been satisfied with what I have done, there have been frustrating times for me. But most of the frustration occurred when I forgot the nature of my role.

Encouragement from some of you has reminded me that not everyone is thrilled when the warning light appears.

For others, it has been the personally accurate nature of the warning that has caused you to bang your fists against the dash panel. You forget that even if you make the light stop blinking, it does not mean the problem ceases.

I also have tried to examine issues in a way that requires people to think. Sometimes that means writing loudly — not for personal attention, but for emphasis on the issue itself.

As the warning light, I do not demand that problems be fixed.

That responsibility belongs to you, the individual who cares enough to do what is right.

I believe in accurately informing you, which has caused many to examine the core substance of current events. However, it has been you who have made the difference. Every one of you who have chosen to examine topics in light of truth are doing the difficult work. You have taken the initiative to seek truth. You then have made this world better by pointing others toward that truth.

If you think the light is needlessly flashing, or flashing too brightly, I hope you at least recognize why it is flashing. Warning lights are not meant to make you feel good. My responsibility is first to warn you, then to help you understand the issues better. However, if you take no action to do what you know to be right, any failure belongs to you. My role has been fulfilled.

It is paramount for you to know what you believe and why you believe. This does not mean you are always right, but if you are consistently moving toward the truth, you are doing well.

As the warning light, I know the danger of things feeling too comfortable. If everything is going perfect on the outside, there is little incentive to upkeep the engine, but there comes a time when all of the pretty on the outside becomes ugly from the rumble inside. I hope that I have helped you stop the rumble before it starts.

Despite all the controversy, thanks to all you liberals who have taken the time to e-mail me. It has been a pleasure reading your comments.

Much thanks to those who have graciously supported me by sending loads of e-mail. Most importantly, thank you for defending the truth in your personal conversations across campus and across the state.

I want to personally thank my friend, John, for his encouraging me to continue writing what I knew needed to be said.

And thanks to those who don't write but who simply choose to do good every day. Thank you for making daily choices to say and do what you know to be right, even though you are not in the spotlight.

You probably won't make the news or be talked about across campus, but it is people like you who make K-State an enjoyable place to be. Keep it up. Do not lose heart but fight for what is right all the more earnestly.

Those who loudly speak the liberal babble are terrified by the silent majority. The liberals know that the average person will not believe the hypocrisy of their agenda. They struggle with understanding how you and I are capable of having convictions that outlast temporary trends.

Don't let their talk bother you too much. Rush Limbaugh put it like this, "Liberals are the itch, and you are the scratch."

One way of scratching that itch is to smile and tell all the politically correct ultra liberals to have a merry Christmas. It will make their happy holiday that much merrier.

It has been a privilege writing for you. I hope to do it again soon.

Bishop says Snyder keeping him from media helped, not hurt Heisman run

By DOUG TUCKER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Anybody who says Bill Snyder hurt Michael Bishop's chance for the Heisman Trophy will have to argue with Michael Bishop.

The K-State quarterback shows unwavering loyalty to the coach who muzzled him much of the year.

"By not being able to talk to the media, it allowed me to sit back and concentrate and have more time to look at video," Bishop said. "It helped me more than it hurt me."

At Snyder's insistence, Bishop was kept from the interview room for four weeks last year and six weeks this season.

Still, despite the loss of media access and lack of Heisman hype from the campus, Bishop's running, passing and game-breaking elan have made him one of the finalists for college football's most prestigious award.

If K-State had scored just one more point in regulation in the Big 12 Conference title game, Bishop and the rags-to-riches Wildcats would be making tracks for the Fiesta Bowl to face Tennessee in the national championship game.

But Texas A&M's double-overtime victory sent the Wildcats into postseason free fall — all the way down to the Alamo Bowl against unranked Purdue.

For Boilermakers fans, it'll be an opportunity to see what Big 12 teams have come to know well — a quarterback who runs and passes with almost equal ability, who has lost twice and won 22 times in two entertaining seasons that vaulted the Wildcats (11-1) higher than they'd ever been.

"He puts pressure on everybody on your defense," Texas A&M coach R.C. Slocum said. "The defensive linemen are worrying about him scrambling. The corners are worried about covering their guys, plus him scrambling."

After leading Blinn (Texas) Community College to two perfect seasons and two national junior college championships, the 6-foot-1, 210-pounder from the Houston area began immersing himself in an offensive system at K-State that's almost as complex as what he'll see in the NFL.

Some wondered how he'd handle it, especially without benefit of spring practice before his first season.

"We knew it could be a rocky road trying to develop him," said Snyder, who has transformed K-State from one of the most losing programs in college football. "The way he responded was very positive. He made steady improvement throughout the course of that first year."

He'll go into the Alamo Bowl with 748 yards rushing and 2,844 passing. He has scored 14 touchdowns running and thrown for 23 while averaging a shade less than 300 yards of total offense every game.

Since graduating from high school, he's 47-2 as a starting college quarterback.

"He is the most significant quarterback in college football today," Kansas coach Terry Allen said.

His one drawback may be a high-strung temperament. He fumbled on three successive possessions during the victory that snapped Nebraska's 29-year winning streak over the Wildcats. Texas A&M knocked the ball out of his arm in the fourth quarter to set up their tying TD in the Big 12

Championship game.

"Sometimes I tend to get overexcited, get psyched up too high," he said. "I don't think I would be the same player if my emotions weren't showing on the field. My emotion carries me a long way."

His arm is strong enough to throw the ball 70 yards with accuracy, but he loves to tuck the ball in and take off running. As the focus of every defensive game plan, he sometimes takes a terrible beating. Yet, he has never missed a start.

"Whenever I drop back to pass, I am prepared to take the hit," he said. "When I run the ball, I'm going as hard as I can. I know when defensive players see quarterbacks running the ball, it is the perfect shot for them to take the quarterback out of the game. But I turn into a running back."

BEATING the PRESSURE

Women's team defeats
Kent State's full-court trap, wins game 67-64

BY NICK BRATKOVIC

The Cats won the battle Wednesday night. Facing a Kent State team who pressed and trapped throughout the game, K-State head coach Deb Patterson's team escaped with a 67-64 win Wednesday night.

It was a game that Patterson said would be won by whomever controlled the tempo of the game.

"I was proud of our team's ability to change personality as the game progressed," Patterson said.

Patterson talked about the maturity of freshman guard Essence Perry, who struggled throughout the night but hit a clutch three pointer with 1:18 on the clock, and the game tied. Patterson said she was pleased with her ability to hit the big shot when she needed it.

"She struggled throughout the game, but I was impressed with her ability to step up. When we needed a big shot, she got it, and that says a lot for her maturity," Patterson said.

In the first half of Wednesday's game, the Cats faced a tough and relentless Kent State press and at times, handled it relatively well.

At other times, turnovers plagued the team. At one point, the Cats committed seven turnovers in seven minutes.

The Cats spread the scoring wealth to several players in the first half. Guard Kim Woodlee hit three 3-pointers in the first half, entering halftime with eleven points.

Forward Nicky Ramage also scored eleven points in the first half, shooting five-of-seven in the half.

As a team, the Cats entered intermission shooting 48 percent from the field and leading Kent State 40-30.

In the second half, Kent State came out strong and pressed the Cats once again.

Kent State, led by guard Dawn Zerman, fought back and began to tear away at K-State's lead. With 12:46 on the clock, Kent State destroyed a 10-point deficit and tied the game.

A minute later, with 11:45 remaining, the Golden Flash took its first lead of the game.

K-State forward Angie Finkes said they needed to work on coming out strong in the second half.

"We came out in the second half kind of flat, and we have really struggled on that," Finkes said. "We need to work on that."

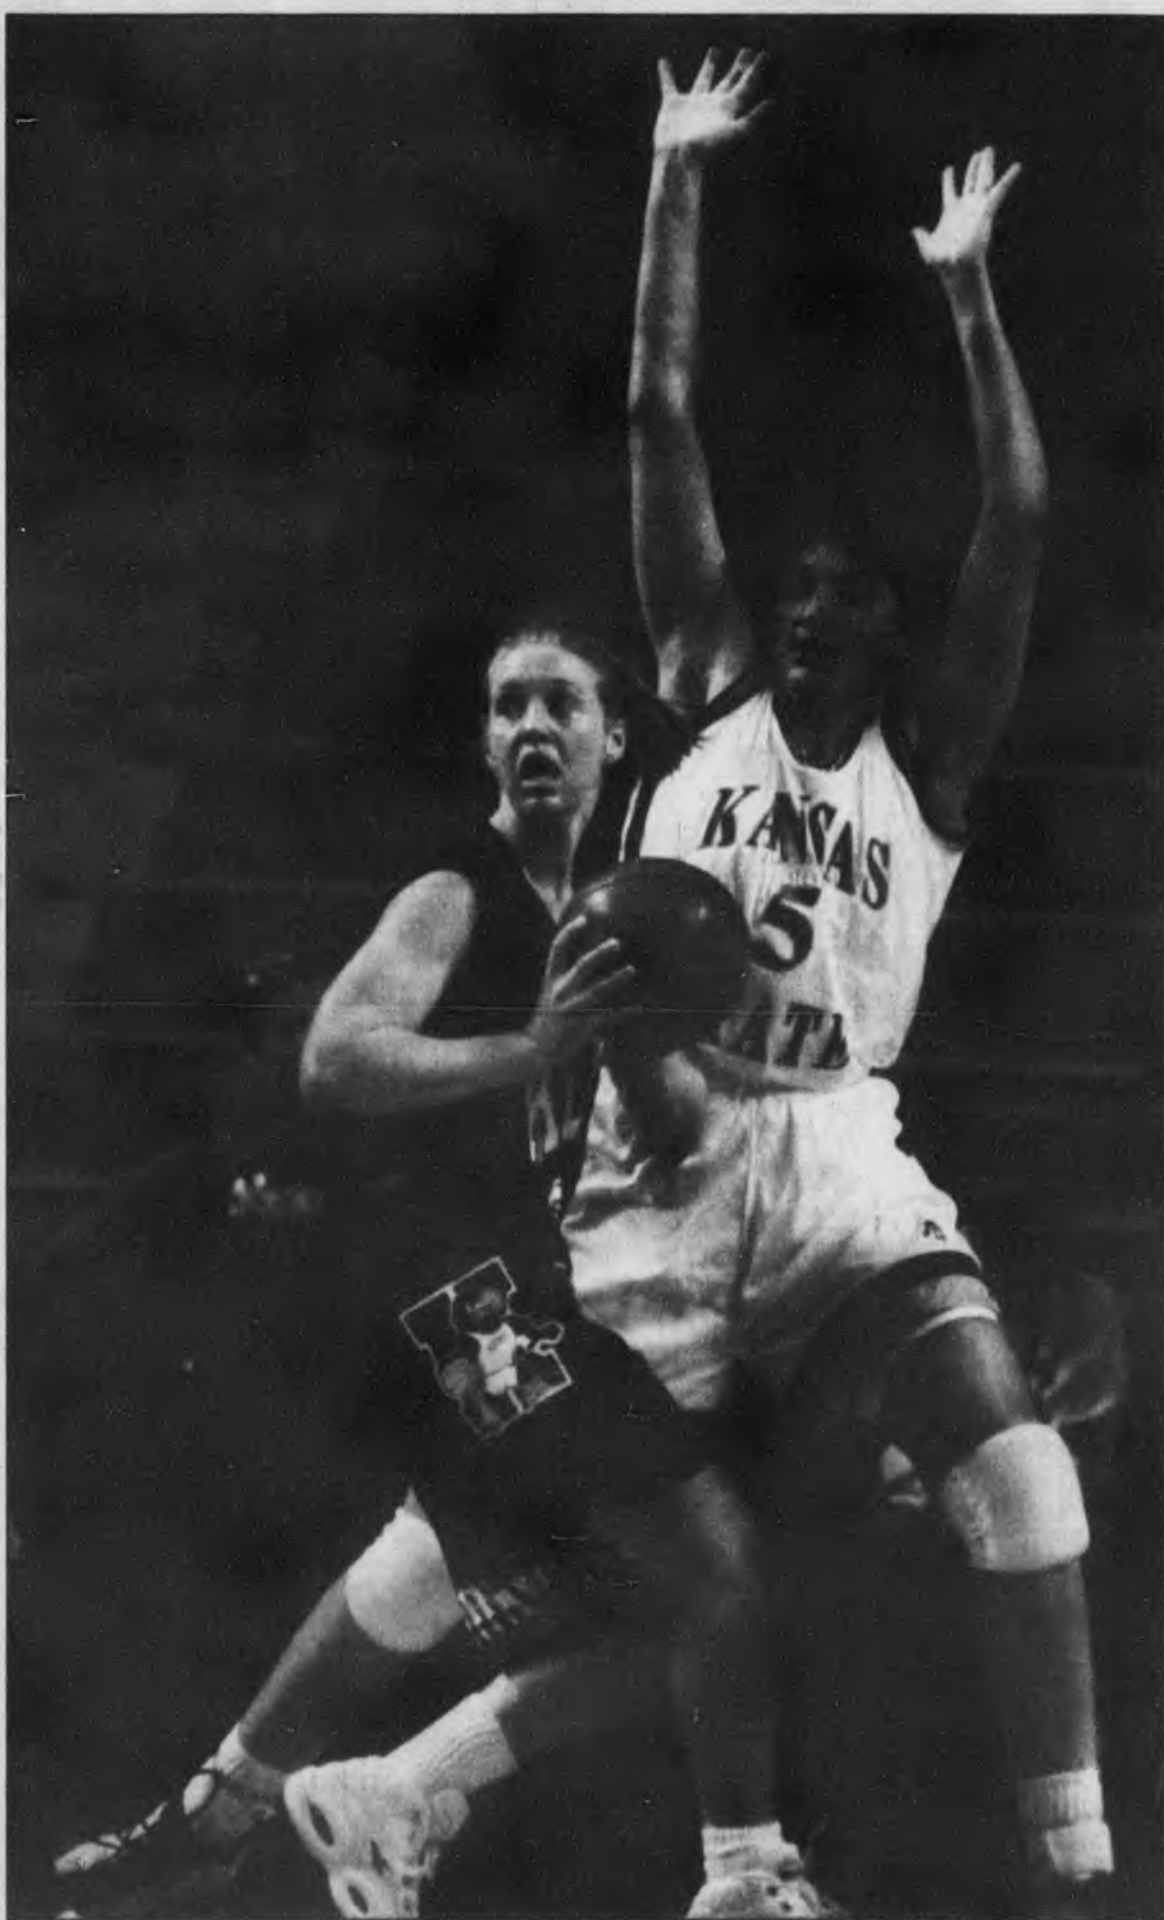

From that point on, the game resembled a heavyweight championship fight as the teams traded basket after basket and the lead changed hands three times before center Olga Firsova put the team ahead with a layup at the 5:03 mark.

Down the stretch, the Cats received a boost from Firsova when she hit a key 15-foot jump shot with 22 seconds left to seal the game.

"When Olga hit that 15-footer, it was all good," Finkes said.

Finkes said the game was great preparation for Big 12 Conference play.

"I think these games are the most fun to win by," Finkes said. "When you win by 20 points, you don't always have to work hard, but these games prepare you for the Big 12."

K-State's Olga Firsova defends against Jamie Rubis of Kent State during the first half of Wednesday's game. The Cats won the game 67-64.

'Mr. I', BCS culprits in K-State's return to college football's second-tier bowl game

VIETTI

I'm sure all of the Wildcat faithful are disappointed that K-State lost to Texas A&M, as well as the fact that the Cats were slighted by the following bowls in descending order of importance: the Sugar Bowl, the Orange Bowl, the Cotton Bowl, and if that wasn't enough, finally, the Holiday Bowl.

I must admit, my emotions got the best of me when the matchups for those bowls were announced Sunday. I watched the ABC Bowl Championship Series special and witnessed

K-State get dismissed by the clowns who run college football.

After it was obvious the Cats weren't going to any of the premier bowls, ABC did an interview with one of the higher-ups in college football. However, I found his jargon to be an unsatisfying explanation of how the fourth-ranked team in the country could not appear in any of the four major bowls.

So I did what any high-quality journalist would do: I immediately climbed into a bottle of alcohol.

The next day, after I recovered, I got on the horn and interviewed one of the scumbags responsible for the BCS. Unfortunately, he did not want me to identify him, so during the following interview, we'll refer to him as "Mr. I-do-not-care-that-a-few-teams-got-screwed-by-the-BCS-because-ABC-gave-us-a-few-hundred-million-dollars-so-we-would-shut-up-and-let-a-television-network-run-college-football."

Me: So, "Mr. I," what made you change from the standard bowl process a few years ago to the Bowl Alliance system and then to the current situation where we have the BCS?

Mr. I: Well, that's a great question you have there. Did you see that UCLA-Miami game? That was great for college football.

Me: Yeah, I did. But what about the bowl situation — do you think it is really fair to all teams?

Mr. I: You must have read my mind. I was just thinking about what I would say if you asked me that question. How 'bout that Tostitos Fiesta Bowl? I sure do love salsa and chips.

Me: I love them, too. Anyway, back to football — what is your take on a playoff system for Division I football?

Mr. I: Another good question many people have been asking. I think the new Pepsi One tastes better than any diet cola. Did you know it only has one calorie?

Me: Sure, but can we focus a little more on college football now?

Mr. I: What do you think we've been talking about? Listen kid, I've only got so many minutes in the day to waste time with pissants like you, so let's speed things up a bit.

Me: I'd like that a lot, sir.

Mr. I: Good, then let's get to it.

Me: Would the NCAA have changed the BCS for next year if Tennessee, K-State and UCLA all had remained undefeated?

Mr. I: Super question, let me think for a second on this one. ... You know, even though most people disagree, I thought "BASEketball" was one hell of a movie.

Me: Sir, are you aware of the Kansas State situation?

Mr. I: You bet I am. I just love those Jayhawks and Roy Williams. I think they'll rebound from their disappointing season last year.

Me: Let's try some association. When I say a word or phrase, you tell me what comes to your mind.

Mr. I: Sounds like fun. Do I need a helmet?

Me: No. Here's your first word: BCS

Mr. I: Great movie.

Me: The Alamo Bowl.

Mr. I: Davy Crockett.

Me: The American Broadcasting Company.

Mr. I: God.

Me: Ricky Williams.

Mr. I: Loved him in "Good Will Hunting."

Me: Chex Mix.

Mr. I: K-State should be in a BCS bowl.

Me: Zoot Suit Riot.

Mr. I: The BCS is stupid.

Me: Let's go back to a regular format, OK?

Mr. I: Sounds good to me. I like to tackle your tough questions head on.

Me: Has the NCAA ever seriously considered paying its athletes? They do earn a good deal of money for their respective schools.

Mr. I: My boss put it like this once: Bud Light is less filling and it tastes better than Budweiser, but people still like regular Bud better. Why?

Me: I don't know. Do you consider the NCAA to be a business or more of a facilitator for students to earn a college degree while competing in athletics?

Mr. I: Is it true that some people can't roll their tongues?

Me: I don't have any more questions. Is there anything you'd like to add?

Mr. I: Yes there is. I love my dog very much.

Me: OK, I appreciate your taking time out of your day to talk to me, sir.

Mr. I: No problem, Bartholomew. Call me any time you need me to clear up anything concerning the NAACP, I mean, NCAA.

Me: I'll make sure to do that.

Goodbye, sir.

Mr. I: Good morning.

Arts lack cohesiveness, not effort

Area art scene shows glimpses of promise, but is often mired in disjunction and apathy

By RUSSELL FORTMEYER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"When sympathy for avant-garde art per se is the assumption behind a critical attitude, criticism can cease to be judgment and become a form of pedantry in which the goal is to find excitement and meaning in an object where they may not exist. Once thus self-deluded, the critic may write perceptively yet from an absurd position." — John Canaday, former art critic of the New York Times.

I sometimes wonder if we find too much or not enough meaning and relevance in the art produced and exhibited in Manhattan.

For those of us who use art to inject our lives with meaning, there can be a tendency — of which Canaday eloquently writes — to want meaning so bad you could find it in the worst landscape painting you've ever seen.

For all the prairie landscapes, overwrought digital art, hunks of clay and fussy abstract paintings on which I've laid my eyes in the past five years, one begins to wonder if any of it has had any lasting intellectual value.

With a number of exceptions, the answer is a hopeful yes.

For a small Kansas city, we are blessed with an offbeat, sometimes brilliant cadre of local artists. That many of them are localized in Willard Hall is a moot point.

However, having a collection of artists is not akin to having a real community. And although Manhattan has its share of art cliques, the future of the community — its museums, arts centers and artists — lies in doubt.

Of museums and arts centers

The arrival of the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art to campus in 1996 was big news and a difficult subject to consider. Having written exhaustively on the planning and design behind the museum, perhaps for me it became a case of reality not meeting expectations.

I'd blame certain K-State wives for using the museum ad nauseam for exclusive functions that hardly are geared to the modern student. This museum sometimes can be more interested in intellectual pretense than in a primary role as student intellectual center. I wonder if many students have a true interest in the rather lame art history of Kansas or the relatively weak K-State art collection.

The uneven development of the Manhattan Arts Center has been worth the wait. The arts center doesn't generate the campus buzz it could, but its focus on local art is respectable.

The fact that some people ignore it illustrates the desire on the part of some local art glitterati to forget where they live.

Perhaps the most casually fun art locus to open has been the Columbian Theatre and Gallery in Wamego. To see the shows put together by Margaret Buie in that relaxed building is a treat. The current landscape show is another example in a long line of solid, interesting exhibitions.

As always, the one institution that predates all of these and remains truest to its founder's vision is Strecker Gallery. Julie Strecker consistently enlarges her repertoire of representative artists, usually bringing in some new artist that is as intriguing as the last. To artistically arrive in this city, Strecker's door is still knock No. 1.

I'm sad to report that next December not only will mark the 20th anniversary of the gallery, but also its last year of operation. Perhaps Strecker will come back after a rest, or another willing party will step forward to fill what surely will be a large void in the local cultural landscape.

Artists and gossip

As with museum politics, behind-the-scenes stories of the artists sometimes are more interesting than their art.

Again, take the Beach museum. Ever since it opened, I've heard whispered grumblings from local arts patrons about odd exhibition schedules, a frustrated board of trustees, and that director Nelson Britt's spring 1998 departure might not have been entirely voluntary. None of this surprises me, because this campus has a penchant for keeping things secret.

I truly think if the campus arts professionals were allowed to do their jobs without the vicarious involvement of wrong-headed administrators and family — much like Bill Snyder's lovely job — more could be accomplished.

Aside from politics, campus exhibitions have matured quite well since those unfocused early Willard Hall days when the gallery still resembled a classroom.

Unfortunately, there aren't as many gallery spaces on campus as there were in 1994. And a total-campus sculpture program not ridiculously localized at the Beach museum is just a dream.

Overall, I think student artists have mellowed considerably. They seem less willing to take risks and, like the rest of campus, are more interested in the professional careers they hope to start. That, in itself, is not bad, but it doesn't deliver provocative art.

Arts community lacks synergy

If one thing is clear, it's that the campus could use a higher-profile student arts organization — one not localized in the art department. Too often, campus and city arts events lack depth because there is not a more broad-based approach taken to event planning.

Eugene Kremer, professor of architecture, has made strides to make his college's events reflect the greater interests of the university, but this is difficult when few avenues for synergistic relationships exist. Perhaps if a round-table were created, one each for faculty and students, more events could occur with greater access to funding.

This also is true in the greater community. Finding the links between the Columbian, the arts center, Beach, Strecker and campus remains the deciding factor to the future vitality of the community.

Jian Chen, graduate student in economics, looks at photographs from the Earth Angles: Migrant Children in America series in the K-State Student Union art gallery last fall. Forty-one color photographs were featured in the display.

Ruskabank SIZZLES with debut CD

By JEFF ELLIOTT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Music fans in search of something different can rest easy.

Ruskabank, a ska band that had its start in Manhattan, has released a solid debut album that is both free-spirited and original.

The first track, "We Dancin'", is a feel-good song, supported by a strong showing from the group's four-piece horn section, led by trombonist Dave Studnicka.

Accompanying Studnicka are alto- and tenor-sax players Chris Mayne and Ben Shierling, respectively, as well as trumpet player Jamie Rogers.

On the album's third track, "My Friends," lead singer and guitarist Dave Spiker and Co. sing about the many friendships that they have encountered throughout the years. The song relies on the crowd to sing along on the chorus, which is why the song has evolved into a crowd favorite.

"Tuba Socks," a comical song with which most people can identify, takes the listener back to the troubling and frustrating times of shopping with Mom.

This track is a perfect example of the sincere, worry-free approach to music that Ruskabank has taken.

Although many bands out there focus on the negative aspects of life, Ruskabank just lets the music flow and has a good time doing it.

Anyone who ever has been to a show knows the Ruskabank experience is about as fun as it gets.

The band, along with the unpredictable stage antics of keyboardist Donnyves Laroque, can get any audience moving, regardless of the crowd size or its taste in music.

Ruskabank's crowd-pleasing qualities and talented musicianship helped it to win KLZR-105.9 FM The Lazer's Battle of the Bands and landed it on stage with such bands as The Urge, Goldfinger, The Bloodhound Gang and K's Choice at Memorial Hall last December.

"This Took Some Time" is a great album and a relatively easy listen. The Ruskabank sound is a perfect example of how third-wave ska should sound, and its music is a compliment to the many artists of ska's past.

The band's achievements, along with the release of "This Took Some Time," have proven the group's boundaries go far beyond Manhattan and that Ruskabank is, in fact, the real deal.

Undergraduate intercession courses cost $80 a credit hour. Graduate level courses are $113 a credit hour. The first day of classes is Dec. 28. Students can enroll at College Court 131 through the first day of classes.

However, a new location offers new problems that teams hadn't seen in the Delaware basin, like the dense collection of dairy, hog and cattle operations

Research has suggested coliform bacteria, used to warm the nutrient-rich habitat of the intestine, can survive in some sediments, he said. The strips, however, catch the material before it can progress into water supplies.

According to 1997 data, the Black Vermillion, the only tributary completely within Kansas borders, contributes 5.1 percent of the total atrazine loading extension programs like these are finally bringing areas of Kansas into compliance with the Clean Water Act that have been out for years, Barnes said.

"Let's not kill the dog just because he's sick. We could make some sort of rash decision that could make the situation worse," Powell said.

COMING UP SHORT

Task force's report says women underrepresented in higher faculty, administrative roles

STORIES BY SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON

Acoed student population might be the norm at public, undergraduate universities, but K-State's faculty isn't as diverse as its student body.

According to a Jan. 15 report by the Provost's Task Force On Issues Facing Women Faculty, women are significantly underrepresented in higher faculty and administrative roles.

In addition, the number of female assistant professors dropped 1.5 percent, female associate professors rose by 1.4 percent and female full professors increased by 1.7 percent between 1993 and 1997, according to the report.

The self-study also compared K-State with the University of Oklahoma, Oklahoma State University, Texas Tech University, the University of Kansas and the University of Nebraska by percent of female deans and academic department heads. It ranked fifth and sixth out of six, respectively.

Provost James Coffman said part of the problem is a majority of doctoral students historically are men, making it tougher for new women to break into the field as anything but outsiders.

"One of the problems we're looking at is the smaller number of women lends itself to a smaller peer group," he said.

Marc Johnson, dean of the College of Agriculture, said finding female faculty is even tougher for his college, where almost all levels are male-dominated.

"Even if you look at our graduate student population, it's largely male. They're difficult to find and therefore, difficult to hire," he said.

Johnson said the college practices affirmative action and creates dual career appointments to bring married couples to positions. Johnson said he supports the report's recommendation that deans and department heads be evaluated upon their efforts to diversify faculty.

"I think the most effective thing would be if we sent very clear charges that that's part of the job," he said.

Traditions apparently work both ways, however. While the report stated the College of Agriculture's female assistant professor, associate professor and full professor populations at 22.7, 8.1 and 4.7 percent, respectively, the College of Education had more than tripled those numbers in all three levels.

"I think everybody's a little bit of a prisoner of their history. In our case that's an advantage," said Michael Holen, dean of the College of Education.

Still, all 12 colleges showed lower female representation in higher ranks. Holen said his college's best candidates for high-level female faculty also are being approached by school systems in need of administrators. As a result, he said, his college is developing its own mentoring program.

Assistant professor says mentoring process vital

Alice Le Duc said more can be done for new faculty in her department.

Le Duc, assistant professor in the Department of Horticulture, Forestry and Recreation Resources, was informed in May by the faculty board that her contract would not be renewed after her sixth year in the department.

While Le Duc said she understood the reasons for her dismissal, a lack of instruction, a continually changing course load and additional assignments each blocked her progress down the tenure track.

When she came to K-State in 1993, Le Duc, who specializes in woodland plants, was paired with a mentor in the same specialty who offered little help in research or suggestions for funding.

She said the pairing was made by the department head, who perhaps hoped new and senior faculty's conflicting interests would take a back seat to the challenge of research. She said it didn't.

"The bottom line is I had negative mentoring from one of my mentors. I had no guidance on how to begin research they wanted me to do," Le Duc said.

Tom Warner, head of Le Duc's department, declined comment on Le Duc's contract as a faculty governing issue. Warner said, however, his department has had a mentoring program longer than any other in the college, and mentors are volunteers from the senior faculty.

"I firmly believe in the mentoring process," Warner said.

Warner also said his department has hired three new female faculty members in the past five years and has worked with dual career appointments.

In the meantime, Le Duc continued her 1991 floriculture work, outside of her specialty, on the white Poinsettia and a collaboration with the director of the Wichita Research Center on Maple research.

Then there was the class load.

In her first year, Le Duc taught two courses a year. In 1994, 1995 and 1996, she had three. From fall 1997 to her last year, she was scheduled for five courses a year.

"It was that basically there was no consistency. Basically, I have a full-time

Tenants should prepare homes for winter break

By JENNI LATZKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Before students leave for winter break, they need to make sure their housing is set to last through the month.

Dia Williams, leasing agent for University Commons apartments, said there are several things tenants should do before they leave for winter break.

"They should make sure that the thermostat is turned down to 70 degrees," said Williams, junior in family studies and human services.

This keeps the apartment warm enough so pipes don't freeze, but cool enough to keep the electricity bill at a minimum. She also said students should leave faucets dripping to keep their pipes from freezing as well.

"We want them to unplug all of their small appliances, but they can keep their major appliances such as refrigerators plugged in," she said.

Although University Commons doesn't allow pets, Williams said students might want to take their pets with them or make arrangements for their survival.

Traffic increase worries residents near Sykes

By ELIZABETH SCHOFIELD
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A traffic increase on Wildcat Creek Road due to the new Sykes Enterprises Inc., facility has raised concern among residents living nearby.

Bob and Zora McWhorter were riding their bicycles home from their neighbor's house when, as they turned in to their driveway, they were less than three seconds from being hit by a car, they said.

"They were coming so fast I don't think they ever saw us," Zora McWhorter said.

The McWhorters, who live in the house they built on Wildcat Creek Road 28 years ago, are only a few houses away from the site of the new Sykes facility. Before the road was paved, the couple said they could hear cars coming down the road. The hill that hinders visibility from their driveway was not a problem then.

Now, with increased traffic on the road, the lack of visibility causes more of a safety hazard than before.

"Every time I pull out of my driveway, I feel like I'm putting my life on the line," Zora McWhorter said.

Sykes came to Manhattan this summer after receiving state funds and an economic incentives package from the city of Manhattan. The center is the first building in Manhattan's new business park, located near Manhattan Regional Airport. Sykes provides customer service by telephone for computer users.

The McWhorters went to Riley County officials to propose

Committee to begin voting on impeachment articles

■ Gingrich notifies entire house to return to capitol for roll call.

By DAVID ESPO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Edging toward a momentous vote, Republicans on the House Judiciary Committee lined up one by one Thursday night in favor of impeaching President Clinton. Democrats vowed opposition after committee lawyers clashed in closing arguments over alleged "high crimes and misdemeanors."

Rep. James Sensenbrenner of Wisconsin, a senior Republican on the committee, said he would cast his vote "with no joy, but with no apologies, just as those on this committee voted to impeach Richard Nixon 24 years ago."

Rep. John Conyers of Michigan — who sat in judgment during Watergate a quarter-century ago — said lawmakers were "poised on the edge of a constitutional cliff, staring into the void below into which we have jumped only twice before in our history."

All of the committee's 37 members — 21 Republicans and 16 Democrats — were granted time to voice their views in a prelude to today's free-flowing debate on four articles of impeachment against the president. The first votes are expected today, the last on Saturday.

Given the political breakdown of the committee, there was no real doubt about what the outcome would be when Rep. Henry Hyde, the panel's chairman, called the roll on charges arising from the president's campaign to cover up his sexual relationship with Monica Lewinsky.

Speaker Newt Gingrich notified all 435 House members to prepare to return to the Capitol next week for the first impeachment roll call aimed at a sitting president since Andrew Johnson sat in the White House in 1868.

CNS battles hackers with password change

K-State has been under attack for a while now. However, the attacks are electronic, not physical.

"A lot of the attacks come from people who find someone's password that is easy to crack and will masquerade as that person," said Beth Unger, vice provost for academic services.

K-State has attacks on its system almost every day — some of these are harmless, and others can cause major inconveniences, Unger said.

"Someone used K-State to block Internet to the KANREN, which is all of the Kansas educational systems," Unger said. "We're not sure where the attack came from, but we know the person found out one of the faculty's password and logged on as this person, and it took us two hours to stop him."

Recently, the number of break-ins has increased with the K-State systems.

"To help fight the break-ins, we are identifying easy-to-crack passwords and sending letters out to those people," said Harvard Townsend, director of computer and network services.

"They will have until Dec. 18 to change their password."

One way to help fight the break-ins is to get these passwords changed and to begin making it mandatory for everybody to change their passwords twice a year, Unger said.

"We want to heavily publicize how to change passwords and hope students will do it voluntarily," Unger said, "and hopefully, by next fall it will become policy that everyone has to change their passwords twice a year."

A problem some students face is the fact that they don't know how to change their passwords.

There are three ways to change a K-State computing ID. The easiest way is to fill out the form at www.ksu.edu/password. The second way is to log on to the UNIX server, telnet to unix.ksu.edu, and type "passwd," then follow the instructions. The last way is to visit the University Consulting Desk in Hale 313 for assistance.

All faculty and staff must change their passwords by Jan. 31, and all students must change their password by the start of the 1999 fall semester.

State legislator says he'll vote to impeach

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Rep. Todd Tiahrt on Thursday became the first member of the Kansas delegation to say he will vote for impeachment articles.

"It's apparent from all the facts, and even the rebuttals that have been presented, that the president definitely lied to the grand jury, the American public, his staff and his family," Tiahrt, R-Kan., said in an interview.

"Any way you look at that, it's perjury, and that alone is enough to justify an impeachment vote in the House."

As he spoke, the House Judiciary Committee was hearing final arguments over alleged "high crimes and misdemeanors" by President Clinton, and Speaker Newt Gingrich prepared to bring it to a full House vote next week.

Of the 435 House members, none of the four from Kansas serves on the judiciary panel. The coming vote generally divides lawmakers along party lines, but the remaining three Kansans, GOP Reps. Jerry Moran, Jim Ryun and Vince Snowbarger, had not announced their intentions late Thursday.

"Drawing distinctions between which felonies are impeachable offenses and which are not is a very dangerous road to begin traveling," Tiahrt said.

Tiahrt, whose 4th District includes Wichita, was among Republicans who last year signed legislation calling for an impeachment inquiry.

"At that time I had no idea that the president had an ongoing affair with Monica Lewinsky and that it would be something like that that would bring it to the public's eye, because I thought there were other things that were worthy of investigation," he said.

Unlike Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback and Rep. Vince Snowbarger, Tiahrt never called for the president's resignation, saying he preferred to wait for Starr's report and the response from Clinton's legal team.

Clinton trip eased by PLO, Israeli actions

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip — The Palestinian leadership on Thursday scrapped constitutional clauses rejecting Israel's existence and said it would try to prevent violence that has jeopardized the peace — moves that might smooth President Clinton's visit to the region.

A group of senior Palestinians, led by Yasser Arafat, voted overwhelmingly to declare clauses of the PLO charter calling for Israel's destruction null and void, a key condition of the Clinton-brokered Wye River agreement two months ago.

Jibril Rajoub, the Palestinian security chief, said the Palestinian Authority would take steps to curtail riots sparked by Israel's refusal to release prisoners jailed on anti-Israel charges.

Selim Zanoun, who announced the decision by the Palestine Central Council to nullify the offending passages, said the larger Palestine National Council will not vote again on the matter when it meets Monday.

Israel insists the full council formally vote to void the passages and has said if there is no vote on Monday, it will not implement the next troop withdrawal scheduled under the Wye Agreement.

UN inspectors block access to party office

BAGHDAD, Iraq — In a dramatic and direct challenge to U.N. weapons inspectors, an official of Iraq's ruling Baath Party declared Thursday that U.N. teams would be barred from a party office they tried to inspect a day earlier.

If they return, they won't enter, said Latif Nsayyif Jassim, a member of the party's leadership.

The U.N. inspectors, who are carrying out an intensive week of searches in Baghdad and elsewhere, said they have the right under U.N. resolutions to examine any site without conditions.

A team of 12 inspectors was turned back Wednesday from the regional office of the party — one of four in the capital.

The team was asked for a written declaration of what it sought, said the Iraqi News Agency. It refused and left the premises, the agency said.

In Washington, D.C., Clinton administration officials said Thursday that Iraq's latest rejection of U.N. weapons inspectors doesn't bode well and that Iraq should not test American resolve.

Scientists hope worm research aids humans

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Scientists for the first time have mapped the entire gene pattern of an animal, a tiny worm that already is providing clues to human problems such as cancer, aging and Alzheimer's disease.

Experts called the achievement an important advance in the ambitious effort to map the human gene structure and to use that knowledge someday to find the causes and cures of various human diseases.

The worm, a type of nematode called Caenorhabditis elegans, is as common as dirt. A handful of garden soil contains thousands.

The animal provides a crucial key-hole view of the vast world of genetics, said Robert H. Waterston, leader of a Washington University, St. Louis, team that joined with British scientists to find the worm's genes.

By studying genes shared by worms and humans, researchers will learn at a molecular level what can go wrong and how to fix it. Such microscopic studies are virtually impossible in humans.

Fraternity donates time to Head Start

By SUZANNE WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kappa Sigma fraternity members prepared to put on a little song and dance Thursday as nearly 70 children poured into a room at the Head Start building in Manhattan.

Kids ran to each of the men, and climbed onto their laps, anxious to make a new friend. While some members were a little hesitant at first, they quickly warmed up to the children.

Kappa Sig chose to work with the Head Start Program of Riley County this year for its philanthropy event. Mary Ann Jackson, lead teacher at Head Start, said she thought it is great to have Head Start volunteers who are men.

"We have a lot of single parents, and the kids need to be around more men," Jackson said.

Kappa Sig president Jeremy Kelley said this is the main reason Kappa Sig chose to work with Head Start.

"A lot of those kids don't have male role models, and here's a fraternity packed full of men who are willing to help out," Kelley said.

Members of the fraternity planned various activities with the children. They gathered children into a circle and sang songs such as "Old MacDonald Had a Farm" and "The Wheels On the Bus Go Round and Round." As they sang, Kappa Sig members taught the children hand motions to go with the words.

The children then were divided into small groups, and books bought by Kappa Sig were handed out to members to be read to the kids.

Dana Hinshaw, Kappa Sig housemother, said she was excited about the event's outcome. She said she thought it was very important for the men to support someone with their finances and their presence.

"With this, they can do something and see their money at work," Hinshaw said.

Fifty-five of the fraternity's 68 men drove to four different sites on Thursday to hand out books and T-shirts to kids in the Head Start program.

Hinshaw said those who did not participate wrote personal messages in each of the books for the children.

"The boys really get as much out of this as the kids do," Hinshaw said. "They were real excited."

Each member of the fraternity gave $10 to help fund the books and T-shirts. The rest of the money came out of house funds.

Sally Frick, director of Riley County Head Start, said she was impressed that the members wanted to read books to the children.

"Literacy is so important to establish early on," Frick said. "You could just tell they wanted to be here."

Hinshaw said the fraternity is hoping to work with Head Start again next year and possibly sometime in the spring. She said some members are interested in coming once a month.

"Three or four of the guys said they're going back because they had so much fun today," Kelley said.

Head Start child development program is a federally funded program that works with families at or below the poverty level throughout the nation. It helps children prepare for school and helps families to find resources needed to meet personal goals. There are 166 families enrolled with Head Start of Riley County.

Commission rejects punishing Clinton, Dole for campaigns

By JONATHAN D. SALANT
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Federal Election Commission unanimously decided Thursday against ordering the campaigns of President Clinton and Republican challenger Bob Dole to repay millions of federal dollars for violating spending limits.

The commission rejected its auditors' argument that millions of dollars in TV ads run by the Democratic and Republican parties should count against the spending limits agreed to by Clinton and Dole in exchange for receiving federal funds for their campaigns.

Clinton campaign officials estimated their final bill will be only $16,000 now that the party ads have been removed.

"This issue should never have been included in the audit report in the first place," campaign counsel Lyn Utrecht and Democratic National Committee general counsel Joseph Sandler said in a joint statement.

Even with Thursday's decision on issue ads, the Dole campaign still would owe $3 million if the FEC upholds additional auditors' recommendations. Campaign counsel Kenneth Gross said he expected the commission eventually to reject most of the other findings, sharply lowering the final repayment figure.

"We're very pleased that the commission has done the right thing regarding the issue ads," Gross said. "It's too bad that the staff report had to come out and cast an aspersion for a period of time."

The auditors said that the parties coordinated the ads with the campaigns, to the extent that some Democratic Party ads and Clinton campaign commercials were identical.

The commissioners disagreed. "I don't adopt the recommendations, I don't adopt the findings and I don't adopt the legal analysis," Commissioner Karl Sandstrom, a Democratic appointee, said.

The decision wiped out most of the original recommendation that the Clinton campaign repay $7 million and the Dole campaign $17.7 million. The commission already had voted Wednesday to reduce any possible Dole repayment by millions of dollars by considering Republican ads as expenditures for the primaries rather than the general election, changing the repayment formula. Other, smaller repayments recommended in the audits are yet to be addressed.

Critics of the way campaigns are funded argued the FEC vote gives the parties carte blanche to spend as much money as they want to help candidates in the 2000 presidential election.

"The FEC has basically given their stamp of approval for a major means of circumventing the law," said Donald Simon, executive vice president of the watchdog group Common Cause.

"They've said candidates can agree to spending limits in exchange for public money, but that agreement can be made with a wink, and those spending limits can be evaded by having the parties spend the money for the candidates," he said.

The commission declined to address specifically whether the party advertisements should be considered illegal contributions to the Clinton and Dole campaigns, as the auditors contended.

That issue for the moment was left to the FEC's investigators, should they launch a probe based on the auditors' findings. It is doubtful the commission would approve any enforcement action.

Moving out by self makes for big mess

In case you have yet to notice, you're in college now. Most of you, if you haven't already, will be moving out on your own soon. Having experienced this first hand, I can tell you it isn't as easy as it looks. Without mommy and daddy around, you begin to look at the few things you do have in a different perspective. So what I did was walk around my house and look at how my perception of common household products has changed since I left home. Let's start in the kitchen.

The microwave — Once, it was something merely used to reheat leftovers. Now it is an essential tool for survival. It is a primary source of nourishment.

The sink — Once, it was the place to clean dishes so they could be reused. Now it is a storage place for dirty dishes until you can afford to throw them away and buy new, clean ones.

The refrigerator — Once, it actually had food in it. Yes, I remember those days well. Now it is a big, cold, white empty thing that occasionally houses pizza leftovers.

The smoke detector — Once, it was a precautionary tool to let you know when smoke was present. Now it is something you take the batteries out of before you start cooking and put back in when are finished and the smoke has cleared.

The fire extinguisher

— Once, it was a tool to put out fires that might accidentally start in your home. Now it is a necessary device to make your chicken flambe, meat loaf flambe, cereal flambe, etc. edible.

The blender —

Actually, I don't remember my parents ever using a blender. But now, heh, heh. You know what to do with a blender.

Moving out of the kitchen, we enter the bedroom. The alarm clock — Once, a harmless device that awoke you in time to catch the bus, it is now the source of all that is evil on this Earth.

The closet — Once, it was a place to hang your clothes. Now it is a sanctuary for your dirty clothes.

The chair — Once, it was a place you could sit down and relax/do homework/watch television. Now, well, your closet is only so big.

The Playstation — Once, it was a harmless activity you engaged in every now and then to unwind by blowing stuff up with a grenade launcher. Now it is the primary reason you can't be diligent in your studies.

VIEWPOINT

The dresser — Once, it was a place you placed your neatly folded clothes. Now it is the resting place for your $5,000 stereo system.

The computer — Once, it was a device to help enlighten your mind. Now it is used primarily for computer games.

Leaving the bedroom, we enter that room where the washer/dryer stuff is.

The washer/dryer — Once, you put dirty clothes inside of it, and they came out clean. Now it is a place to hide your beer when your parents/unexpected friends/expected friends come over.

The ironing board — Once, it was used to iron wrinkled clothes. Now it is an alternate coffee table.

The vacuum cleaner — Once, it was used to clean the floors of your home. Now it is a device you use when your roommates are on the phone and you want them to get off so you can use it.

Do these sound familiar? I thought so. Maybe I forgot something, but that's just about everything in my house. It's a good thing I don't have a fireplace.

The last round of ramblings from a red-headed columnist

Well this is it. If you are reading this, then you've made it, too. We have come to the end of another semester. It is now time to go home and celebrate the holidays without any scholastic concerns — as opposed to all those scholastic concerns I have right now, such as remembering what classes I should be attending.

This winter break I will be celebrating the arrival of the new millennium. I figure if everyone is going to celebrate a false millennium on Dec. 31, 1999, I will have my false celebration one year earlier.

Maybe that way Jerry and Kramer both can come to my millennium party.

Television just told me the millennium already has chosen a sponsor for the official celebratory beverage. My congratulations to Korbelt on winning the millennium account; it must have been difficult. The millennium usually is strict about who it chooses to have as a sponsor.

Like Homer, if the television said it, then I believe it must be true.

Speaking of alcohol, I'm thirsty. Keeping in the traditional genre of writing I have nestled myself into this semester, this column promises to be my most random ramblings yet. I am going to share with you a collection of quotes gathered from acquaintances. Their names are not given in full to spare them the embarrassment of associating with me.

I tried to make them relate, but Spandex, this column's sponsor, even would call it a stretch.

Keeping in the spirit of the holidays, it is only fitting to begin with where I began, the family. While at my parents for Thanksgiving, my father worried that his Mike Tyson-esque behavior would end up in one of my columns, or maybe one of Ken Wells's. I told him it wouldn't, so the quotes shall begin with my mother who always can make me laugh without ever telling a joke.

After I ran over a bale of hay on the highway, I called my mother and told her I had a problem with my car. My mother, having only one other son who is not legal to drive yet, listened to my story and said, "Who is this?"

Curious as to who a particular female on television was, I asked my roommate her name. His reply reiterated the fact he was the world's most eligible bachelor, "I don't know, but she wants me."

While riding in my car, Leroy Jones, a man easily pleased, made an addendum to the old clichéd philosophy when he realized, "Besides sex, drugs and rock 'n' roll, playing video games is my only other interest."

While playing a video game in which he had entered in codes of invincibility, preventing any imminent death, Thirston, always the optimist, reminded his girlfriend, Jenny, that, "You know, you could win."

My girlfriend, who always is trying to help me, especially in suggesting ideas for my columns, said,

VIEWPOINT

PACEY

"You should write about me."

She doesn't think this mention counts. Wondering if anything really counts, an anonymous source said, "I don't know if there is a God, but if there is, he created Showtime."

"God didn't invent that, John Sebastian did in 1842," Sloan said, putting an end to the debate about where charcoal grills came from, but beginning the debate about where he got that information.

"It's a soft tortilla shell, I don't imagine it causing any permanent damage," BMX Brian said of the blatant disregard for hunger concerns in Ethiopia by K-State fans, who prematurely tossed food onto the football field.

Looking pensively at his food before him, my best friend, John Paul, wondered, "If I eat the cheese, will it grow moldy?"

He has not been able to hear the word Velveeta without snapping ever since.

"Don't you bu-bye me outta here, I'm leaving," Jammer said, reminding me she was leaving of her own volition and not because I was done talking to her.

"These have just been the ramblings of..." said some redheaded, four-eyed writer wishing all of you to find happiness in the simplest things in life, not just in those fantastic presents you and I both better be getting.

It doesn't take blood relation to consider someone family

Family. What does this word mean?

Should someone be counted as family simply because they are related to you by blood? Or does it go much deeper than that?

Over the past few weeks, I have been analyzing just who I count as family, and I have found that most of the people I consider most dear aren't even related to me.

I discussed this with my mother, and she began to realize the same thing.

The people who mean the most to me, and who do the most for me, are not always those related to me. As a matter of fact, I have some relatives who cause more problems in my life than happiness. If these people were just anyone off the street, or if I wasn't related to them, chances are I would have nothing to do with them. But, because I am related to them, they are allowed to get away with much more than anyone else.

I find this concept a little disturbing.

My idea of family is a group of people who love you for who you are and who will go out of their way to be kind and helpful whenever you need it. I have many friends I know I can count on for anything. I would do anything for them, and they would do anything for me.

But I can't say that about my "family."

Because of the upcoming holidays, there is a major emphasis on spending time with relatives, and sometimes I wonder why. What is so enjoyable about spending time with people who don't really even know who you are? Some of the folks I will interact with over Christmas might not even know my name, but I still am supposed to hold them more dear than other people I am not related to.

I don't buy it.

In my life, I have learned to pick and choose just who I consider family. The person I call my sister is actually my half-sister, and I am not really related to my "brother" at all. (He is my stepfather's son.)

These two people are great examples of what family should be. They don't only call when they want something.

They honestly care about my well-being and happiness, and I know I can depend on them for anything I might need.

This might sound kind of weird, but I would say it applies to almost everyone. Who in your life is most important to you? A friend who does more for you than your entire family put together, or long lost Uncle Bob from Wisconsin, who you see about once every five years?

The closest people to me and my immediate family aren't all related to us. My neighbor has done more for my mother and me than almost every member of our family. My mother has friends from high school who have been more helpful through her recent illness than many people we consider "close family." There are many people who share my last name and, after 20 years of being related to me, know less about me and care less about me than friends.

I only have known for three or four years. This is what makes me question who my true family members are.

During this holiday season, take time to sit down and take stock of who your real family is, and make sure you let them know how much they mean to you. It is these people who deserve your attention and love more than anyone else, regardless of how they are related to you.

Flint Hills Breadbasket still taking donations for Christmas baskets

■ Volunteers will form assembly line to fill baskets with fresh potatoes, bread, beans.

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Christmas is around the corner, and everyone is gearing up for the festivities. One local organization is preparing to give families who cannot afford the cost of a Christmas meal a chance to have one.

The Flint Hills Breadbasket is in the process of putting together holiday baskets to distribute to more than 1,800 families for the holidays. Shirley Bramhall, executive director of the Breadbasket, said everything from green beans and cranberries to ham and turkey are in each basket.

"The problem is that no two baskets are the same. One might have Green Giant green beans while another has Food-4-Less, or one might have pumpkin and another has cranberries," Bramhall said.

The food in the holiday baskets is given by donors throughout the month of December. Baskets also were done for Thanksgiving, but the ones for Christmas are more in demand.

"A lot of people go home for Thanksgiving or find out the baskets are available after the holiday and then sign up for Christmas baskets," Bramhall said.

Volunteers will form an assembly line to put each basket together on Dec. 20. Flour, fresh potatoes, bread and stuffing are included in these holiday dinners. They then are distributed Dec. 20-23.

"I am helping somebody who needs it," Vicki Rodriguez, Breadbasket volunteer, said. "The food is being distributed to those that need it for their holiday dinners."

Bramhall said turkey, ham or chicken also is in the baskets, depending on the size of the family. Usually, these perishable items are not donated, so Bramhall will purchase the balance of what remains to complete the baskets.

"This gives us the opportunity to give to someone else. We are blessed every day to help an awful lot of people," Bramhall said.

The Breadbasket still is short about 40,000 pounds of food to complete the baskets, but volunteers are not worried.

"So many people are giving, so I don't think it will be a big problem," Rodriguez said. "The food is distributed fairly, and only the people who are not registered for the baskets may not get as much food. Those are the ones we are worried about."

Jardine residents get telecommunications choice

By GABE ECKERT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Residents of Jardine Terrace Apartments have been given the choice they wanted, said Leobardo Hernandez, Jardine Residents' Council president and graduate student in architecture.

Earlier in the semester, Jardine residents said they were being pressured into accepting a telecommunications package they did not want. Since then, a compromise has been reached.

As a result, Jardine residents are being offered a new package from K-State's Telecommunications.

The package includes long-distance telephone service, cable television and ethernet connection to the Internet. The services are similar to those provided to the residence halls, said Fred Damkroger, director of K-State Telecommunications.

The new telecommunications service is not mandatory. Residents are given a choice of using the service, Damkroger said.

"The telecommunications package will benefit residents," he said. "It will provide an enormously increased Internet speed and other advantages."

A timeline for providing the new package to residents who want it has not yet been finalized. However, planning for the installation has begun, Damkroger said.

A survey conducted by the Jardine Residents' Council showed about half of the residents wanted the service; the other residents wanted the option of finding their own telecommunications package, Hernandez said.

"I believe the service will probably be beneficial for those who use it," he said. "But it is important for residents to have the choice."

Hernandez also said that to make the package successful, he would like to have the rates continually monitored and adjusted. He also said he would like a comprehensive plan developed for the future of Jardine.

Busy holiday break for squad includes start of Big 12 play

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

While K-State students will be sipping eggnog and relaxing during winter break, the men's basketball team will spend the holiday in the midst of jump shots and lay-ups.

After a week off from their 64-47 victory over Wichita State this past Tuesday, the Wildcats get back into full swing by playing seven games, including three road contests and the start of Big 12 Conference play, to finish off the holiday season.

Not counting K-State's November contests at the neutral Maui Invitational, the team will get its first taste of opposing crowds when the Cats face 3-4 Long Beach State at the Pyramid on Dec. 12. The game marks the third straight season the teams have tangled.

"We have got to get Wichita State behind us," head coach Tom Asbury said. "Long Beach State will be laying for us. They're a confident team."

"A lot of this team has never played a true road game. I'm interested to see how that will turn out."

The 49ers have both perimeter and inside strength with sophomore guard Ramel Lloyd and junior center Mate Milisa leading the way. Lloyd, a transfer from Syracuse University, averages 16

Highlights of schedule include games against UMKC, No. 21 Oklahoma State points a game, while Milisa, who hails from Zagreb, Croatia, tosses in 12.7 and pulls down seven rebounds a game.

K-State has won two of three games against Long Beach State, including an 89-50 romp last year in Manhattan.

Going into the game against the 49ers, senior forward Shawn Rhodes needs two more block shots to top Gerald Eaker's school record of 103 career blocks, set between 1995 and '97.

When the showdown in Long Beach subsides, the Wildcats will head back home to entertain Mid-Continent Conference foe and interstate rival the University of Missouri at Kansas City on Dec. 19.

The 3-6 Kangaroos never have beaten the Wildcats in the 13-year history of the traditional non-conference matchup. Senior guard Eddie Smith paces UMKC with 14.3 points a game and 31 assists.

After the home contest with UMKC, the team will travel to St. Louis to play the Billikens in the Earth Grains Basketball Classic on Dec. 28 at the Trans World Dome, a place K-State fans might never want to return to.

Following their game against Coppin State on Dec. 21 at Bramlage, the Cats will begin conference play at current-No. 21 Oklahoma State on Jan. 2.

The 4-2 Cowboys suffered two straight setbacks, including an 83-81 heartbreaker to Florida Atlantic, which ended the Cowboy's 80-game home winning streak against non-conference foes, and a loss to No. 16 UCLA.

Senior guard Adrian Peterson, a Big

12 Player of the Year candidate and deadly three-point shooter, leads the way for Oklahoma State, averaging 19.2 points per game.

With K-State's game with Wichita State turning into an aggressive clash, featuring a broken nose and concussion suffered by Cortez Groves, Asbury said the physical play will help prepare the team for Big 12 play.

"The Big 12 is an aggressive conference," he said.

"Wichita State's play is the kind of aggressiveness you will see in the Big 12."

The Cats' first home contest of spring semester is Jan. 20 against Colorado.

Royals trade with Mets for 2 starters

Trade brings Joe Randa back to Kansas City.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Kansas City Royals added two potential starters Thursday, re-acquiring third baseman Joe Randa and signing shortstop Rey Sanchez.

Sanchez, who played with the San Francisco Giants last season, agreed to a $1.1 million, one-year contract. Randa, obtained from the New York Mets for former first-round draft pick Juan Lebron, agreed to a $1.61 million, two-year contract.

"With the additions of Sanchez and Randa, we have solidified the left side of our defense," Royals manager Tony Muser said.

Randa, 28, was with the Royals for part of the 1995 season, and all of 1996, when he hit .303 with six homers. He played with Pittsburgh in 1997, then moved on to Detroit, where he hit .254 with nine homers and 50 RBIs.

The Mets acquired him Dec. 4 from Arizona for pitcher Willie Blair, but had no intention of keeping Randa, making the deal just to dump Blair's contract.

Randa, who was eligible for salary arbitration, will receive $760,000 next season and $850,000 in 2000. The deal contains performance bonuses and calls for automatic salary increases if he is traded.

Part of the appeal for Randa is that he lives in Overland Park, Kan. Kansas City was looking for a third baseman after Dean Palmer, their player of the year in 1998, agreed to a $36 million, five-year contract with Detroit.

Muser said Randa was a "nice fit" for the Royals who will upgrade them defensively at third.

He ranked second among American League third basemen last season with a .976 fielding percentage.

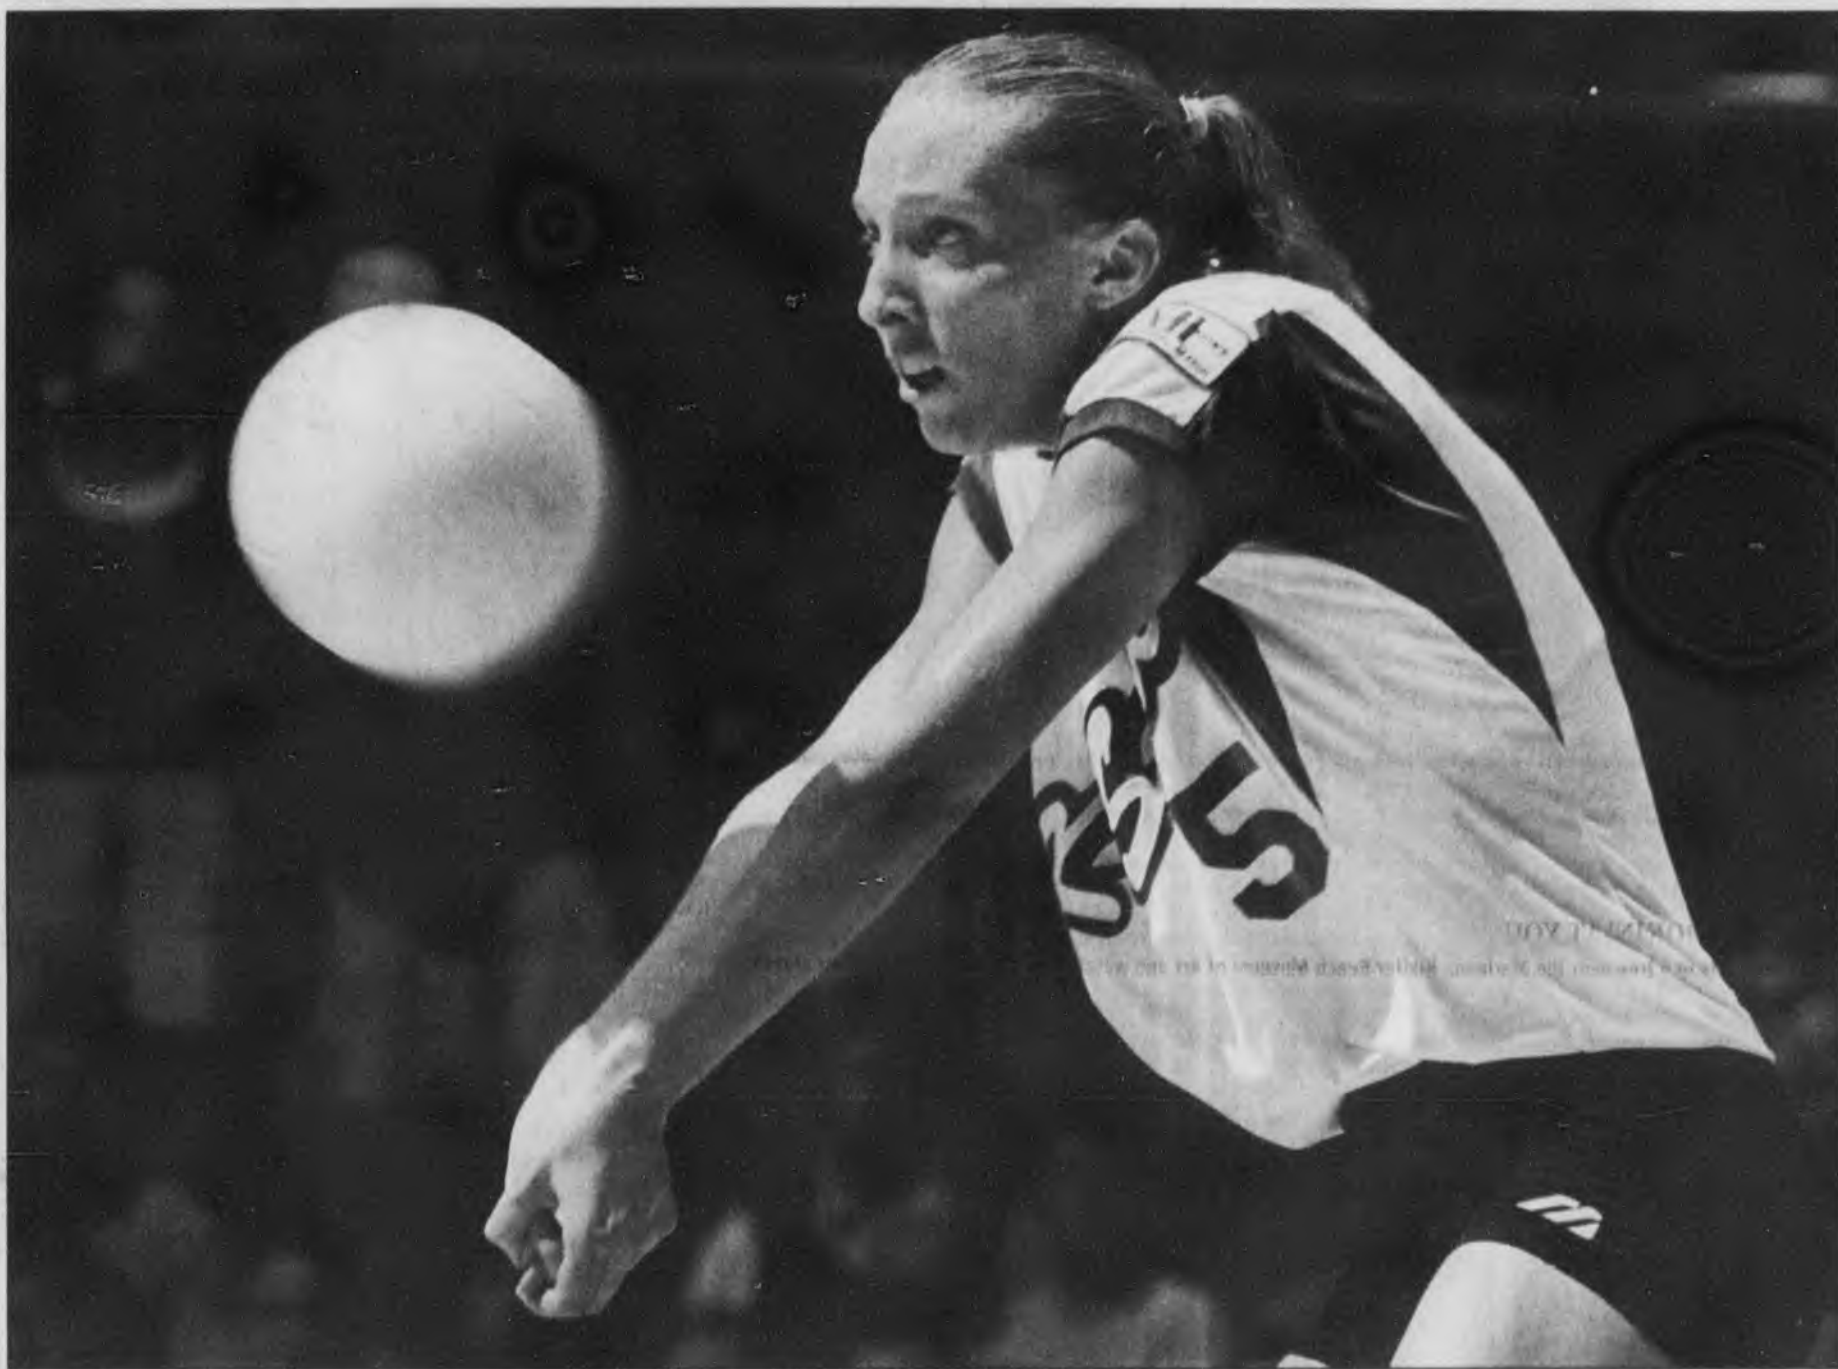

LeBron, the 19th pick overall in the 1995 amateur draft, is highly regarded. He is 21 and hit .251 last season at Class-A Lansing of the Midwest League with 70 runs, 26 doubles, nine triples, 17 homers, 84 RBIs and 18 steals.

Sanchez, 31, hit .285 with the San Francisco Giants in 1998 with two homers and 30 RBIs in 316 at-bats and had a .977 fielding average, making just seven errors.

He has a .268 career average in eight major-league seasons with the Chicago Cubs, New York Yankees and Giants.

Muser said Sanchez will get a chance to be the starter at shortstop, where the Royals were unsettled last season. They started out with Felix Martinez, who was sent to the minors in early June after his role in a brawl with the Anaheim Angels, which resulted in suspensions for both managers and nine players.

After the All-Star break, Mendy Lopez played most of the games at shortstop for the Royals.

Kim Zschau bumps the volleyball during a match against intrastate rival Kansas this fall in Ahearn Field House. The Wildcats defeated the Jayhawks 3-1 with games of 14-16, 15-3, 15-5 and 15-10.

COACH SAYS TEAM MADE PROGRESS

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It was another improved year for the K-State volleyball team in 1998. The Wildcats took a trip to the NCAA National Tournament for the third consecutive season, with seniors Val Wieck and Kim Zschau leading the charge.

Head coach Jim McLaughlin implemented his "always improve in every match" attitude this season and turned it into a success. The Cats went from unranked at the beginning of the season to the NCAA Tournament, finishing with a 19-12 record.

"I think we made good progress," McLaughlin said. "We were a lot better team at the end than we were August 11 when we started."

"Everybody improved, and the team improved as a result from that. We stuck to our plan and invested in the areas we really had to invest in, and we got a return, so I feel good about the year."

With a young squad that featured two freshman starters and only two seniors, McLaughlin said improvement this season separated them from last year's team.

"It was a totally different team this year," McLaughlin said. "I don't know if you can even really compare them. Everybody was better. Kim was better. Val was better. Dawn (Cady) was better. Disney (Bronnenberg) improved all year. Liz (Wegner) helped us in her position and improved as she went on."

"I thought that everyone just contributed in their own way to this team," he said. "I think the contribution they made changed along the way."

McLaughlin was quick to praise the roles of Wieck and Zschau and said he couldn't stress enough what the two seniors meant to this team in all aspects, on and off the court, as leaders.

"I think Kim and Val were in the toughest situation they could be in for four years," McLaughlin said. "They have a freshman setter, they have freshman opposites, and the way they handled them is just outstanding."

Those two girls can handle it. They have great qualities. They are both different people, and I know they will both be very successful in whatever they do because they're very proactive."

"They found the good, they helped lead the charge. There are times in every season when everyone experiences a tough period," he said. "They kept kicking, fighting and scratching the whole time."

The Wildcats accomplished great things this season, but the one hump the team couldn't get over was being able to defeat the Nebraska Cornhuskers. After losing in two attempts this season, the Cats now have lost 59 consecutive matches to the Big Red.

While erasing the losing streak to the Huskers would have been a nice close to the season, McLaughlin said there were many things to be proud of this season, especially the four years turned in by Wieck and Zschau.

"They are the foundation of this program," McLaughlin said. "Coaches are coaches, and they get a lot of credit, but the players can really make a huge impact."

"Val and Kim are probably the two most significant players to ever play here at K-State. You can't measure their contributions to this team. They've set the standards for the future. We'll always try to meet it and exceed it. They were just tremendous."

In case you haven't noticed, and judging by attendance you haven't — we have a women's hoops team

BRATKOVIC

I covered the women's basketball game Wednesday night, and I was one of the only people there.

Now, that might be a bit of a stretch, but it really is kind of an embarrassment when 1,005 people show up for a basketball game. It especially is embarrassing when the outcome was in doubt until the end, and the players persevered through 40 minutes of non-stop pressure to win the game.

Is there anything more pointless in the world than ICAT tickets at women's basketball games? It's pretty sad when tickets are free and still, no one goes.

It's a shame to know more people do not go out and support the Wildcats.

I realize finals are approaching, and with that comes an immense amount of pressure and fear in the hearts of all students, but the crowds have been dead all year. Even at Fright Night, Bramlage

Coliseum was less than half full.

The women's basketball team is a class program and just doesn't get any love from the fans.

What makes it such a travesty is this team is a lot of fun to watch. The Cats this year are a team of characters who go out and play hard; it's a team of many personalities that seems, after early injuries, to be gelling as the Big 12 season approaches.

You watch this team, and the potential that exists is immense. It's like watching a baby crawl on the floor, because as you watch the baby crawl, you can picture the baby walking across the stage at his or her high school graduation or walking with an Olympic torch.

The K-State women's basketball team possesses quality, an unknown potential that makes the games exciting. Look at the roster and the players on the court playing in a near-empty coliseum and you'll realize that come March, these players will be playing in the NCAA Tournament.

K-State has a variety of players who, given time, can truly excel. There is center Olga Firsova from Kiev, Ukraine, the biggest player in K-State history at 6 feet, 6 inches.

Firsova is improving and getting better everyday. She plays with a style that seems to be winning over the fans and hearts of those in attendance.

Then, you have a tremendous tandem of forwards who generate an excellent amount of chemistry on and off the court that's evident in the media and locker room. The mannerisms of Angie Finkes and Nicky Ramage are similar, transforming into energy that spreads to the rest of the team.

When the Cats start to get doubled-teamed inside, head coach Deb Patterson can rely on the outside shot of Kim Woodlee to open up the court.

The team Patterson has molded is one the entire campus can be proud of. Now in her third year at K-State, Patterson has brought a sense of class and style to the program that is epitomized in the way things are done.

Given time, Patterson can do for women's basketball what Bill Snyder has done for football.

With the magic and work turned in so far, it seems obvious Patterson will. A former U.S. basketball coach, Patterson seems to have the team headed in the right direction.

Let's just hope fans begin to show up at Bramlage and cheer on the team as it moves into the future. It's a travesty to see Bramlage desolate when these players take the court and a shame that opposing players don't fear coming to Manhattan.

You know, there's something to be said for watching a team, not expected to win, develop into a quality program. It's what drives Americans to be the best and fight all their lives for what is right.

It's why "Rocky" was a successful movie. "Rocky" was not successful because Carl Weathers was a good actor or because of the scenery in Philadelphia, but it was a great movie because fans love to cheer for an underdog on the brink of greatness.

K-State, like a baby plant given time and room to grow, could become a power quickly. The only question in my mind is, will K-State students and fans be there to watch it, or will the team begin to grow without anyone knowing? Let's hope not.

Cross-cultural interaction goal of Immersion group

By JENNI LATZKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The American Ethnic Studies Student Association's Immersion group and Hillel, the Jewish student organization, have formed a coalition to present a cross-cultural program at 5 tonight at the Manhattan Jewish Congregation.

The Immersion group began in October and has about 26 members. The purpose of the organization is to promote diversity of leadership, said Todd Nicewonger, student development coordinator for the American Ethnic Studies Program. He said AESSA has two purposes.

"The Immersion group's purpose is to begin to develop (the student's) own self, and to experience cross-cultural activities," Nicewonger said. "We are committed to doing five different activities with the African-American, Asian-American, Hispanic, Native American and European-American communities on campus."

Once the immersion process is complete, the group then moves on to the action program, in which it takes all of their experience and put it into focus by applying what it has learned. Nicewonger said. This is how tonight's activity came about, he said.

"They were interested, and so we thought that it might be nice to invite them to join us for the Shabbat service," David Margolies, Hillel adviser, said.

The Immersion group of AESSA and Hillel has several goals for the evening's event. First, it would like to develop a forum for cross-cultural interaction and communication.

Second, the event will teach the members how to plan and execute an event, while also letting the participants move outside of their cultural comfort zone and discuss their different cultures, Nicewonger said. The groups want their members to open up to new ideas and concepts.

The evening will consist of a social mixer beginning at 5, with a Sabbath dinner following. A dialogue will start at 7, and then a service will be offered. The evening will round off with a dessert and social, ending at 9.

Agencies look for alternatives following federal funding cuts

By GABE ECKERT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Community Services of Manhattan might need more support from residents.

Recent cuts to federal and state funding of social-welfare programs have affected local programs, Donald Roufa, professor of biology, said.

"In general, the federal government has been ordered to accomplish reductions in taxes and has terminated a number of social-welfare programs," he said. "The state has eliminated programs as well, opting for local programs."

Two types of changes have been made, Roufa said. Some state and federal social-welfare programs have been eliminated, and federal and state funding for programs has declined. Specifically, programs affected include housing, medical and educational programs aimed at Americans with low income.

Funding to continue these social-welfare programs increasingly is being left to communities such as Manhattan, Roufa said. Providing funding to continue services is a challenge for those communities, he said.

"The difficulty for a town like Manhattan is there isn't an administrative system in place to take over social-welfare fare programs," Roufa said. "Additionally, many communities don't have the resources to financially support the programs."

While Manhattan has received a declining amount of federal and state funding for social-welfare programs, the city has a significant amount of general-fund money dedicated to support social agencies, Roufa said.

The Manhattan Day Care and Learning Centers, established in 1969 to provide social, emotional, physical and cognitive activities for children ages 18 months to six years, have noticed effects of cuts in federal and state funding, Adene Winter, center director, said.

"Since most of our clients are low-income people, money that is cut greatly affects them," she said.

Additionally, the centers have seen many indirect effects, Winter said.

Other agencies in Manhattan affected by cuts in federal and state funding include the Manhattan Emergency Shelter, Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan Inc., the Salvation Army and others.

With less federal and state money provided to these services, there is an increasing social responsibility of citizens to support the agencies, Roufa said.

reducing the hill by about four feet after the road was paved in July.

In fact, they had voiced their safety concerns two years ago at master plan meetings and have been attending meetings since.

They met with the county engineer, Dan Harden, and other county commissioners at their home Monday to demonstrate the problem. The McWhorters said they believe Monday's meeting will prompt action into solving the problem.

"They saw the wisdom of it, the problem with it and the necessity of it," Bob McWhorter said.

WOMEN

"I think the institution is giving more attention to it, but it's something we have to continue because no one can afford to waste talent," Holen said.

Many of the best female candidates also are being recruited by other schools, Ruth Dyer, assistant to the provost, said.

The report concluded that, of entry-level female assistant professors hired between 1989 and 1991, 52 percent left after six years, typically the probationary period for tenure.

With comparatively low salaries at K-State for both male and female faculty, Dyer said Faculty Senate reported retaining those women can be just as difficult as recruiting when better-paying colleges come along, she said.

"One of the things they've document-

"They said they would study it intensively."

Harden said the amount of traffic on the road would affect how much money the county would spend on it.

"Generally, the more traffic it gets, the more dollars it gets," Harden said.

The county set up counters a few weeks ago to monitor the traffic increase and make assessments of what improvements need to be made.

"Traffic count is always a factor in project priority," said Rod Meredith, assistant director of public works for Riley County.

The study found that since the Sykes facility has been operational, the traffic numbers for Wildcat Creek Road and Eureka Drive, the two roads frequented by Sykes employees, increased from 60 to 800 vehicles per day and 60 to 560 vehicles per day, respectively.

Even though the numbers are significant, Meredith said the plans to widen shoulders and improve overall quality of the roads will not happen right away.

"There aren't funds to do the project right now," Meredith said.

Eureka Drive, which also was partially gravel before Sykes moved in, recently had an asphalt primer applied to reduce the dust from Sykes traffic.

"That was the minimum we thought we had to do to get by," Meredith said.

The problem of speeding on the two roads is also one that residents said they felt it needed to be addressed. At times, residents said motorists were not slowing down in the 30 mph speed zone in front of their homes.

Riley County Police Department Lt. G.R. Grubbs said officers have responded to several complaints by residents of speeding on the paved portion of Wildcat Creek Road.

Grubbs said the RCPD set up selective enforcement to monitor speeds in the area.

"We received several complaints from people in the area," Grubbs said. "Our goal was to give ourselves a high profile in the area."

Zora McWhorter said she didn't feel the problem was completely solved by the department's presence.

"When people get tickets, it helps for a while," she said.

Grubbs said the RCPD understands the problem is not solved and will continue to monitor the area whenever necessary. "Periodically, we reserve the right to go out and do selective enforcement to be sure the speed limit is being adhered to," he said.

Although there is nothing that can be done to bring back the aspects of country living residents claim have been lost due to Sykes' presence, Julie Weingardt, customer support center director for the Manhattan Sykes facility, said the company is doing all they can to ensure all it can.

"We've communicated to our employees that we want to be a good neighbor," Weingardt said. "We by no means think that because we bring money in to Manhattan, we can be a bad neighbor."

Weingardt said she has sent e-mail to the more than 500 employees stressing the need to watch speeds in the residential area.

Weingardt said Sykes is also looking forward to the improvements to the roads.

"We don't want it to be an unsafe road for our employees any more than for our neighbors," she said.

She also added the residents should feel free to address any concerns they might have to Sykes.

The McWhorters said they are not angry at anything Sykes has done but are concerned about the dangerous nature of the situation.

"We're not complaining. It's just a fact," Zora McWhorter said. "All we're trying to do is get it civilized so we can live out here."

LE DUC

teaching load, and I'm expected to be doing research," she said.

Finally, Le Duc said she was asked by the department head to serve as acting director of KSU Gardens, which she did from 1995 until last January. Though she loved the project, Le Duc said the position obviously was going to hurt her tenure package and should have been considered more strongly in her evaluation.

Le Duc said she will be leaving Manhattan on Dec. 18 to help care for her terminally ill sister in California, but said she thinks a support system outside of the mentoring program such as a series of workshops, would help other new faculty in the department.

Mary Albrecht, Le Duc's other mentor and former professor in the department, said her own path to tenure at K-State was difficult, partially because of gender bias.

In fact, it was one of the reasons Albrecht left K-State in 1996 to become the University of Tennessee's first female department head of Ornamental Horticulture and Landscape Design, she said.

"You just get tired of fighting the nit-picky battles. There was really some unnecessary pressure on women there, and I think it's still there," she said.

Albrecht said she's still proud of K-State, and the majority of her colleagues were professional, but some need to be chastised.

She said other men would make the biggest difference, so the view isn't of just women complaining.

"Their silence condones this gender bias behavior. The thing they have to remember is do they want their wife or niece or daughter to be treated that way?" she said.

Students living in the residence halls have a set of check-out procedures they must complete before they leave for the break, said Regina Tirella, Moore Hall assistant residence life coordinator.

"They are to take out their trash, unplug everything, close and lock their windows and defrost their refrigerator," Tirella said.

She said students also are to move all of their furniture at least 6 inches away from the walls and one foot away from the heating units.

Residence halls close at 10 a.m. Dec. 20. Resident assistants on each floor will double check to make sure students have completed the check-out procedures.

An added concern for students is security of their residences while they are away. At University Commons, on-site security personnel check the apartments on their daily rounds to make sure nothing is broken into. In addition, the complex also has panic alarms, which can be activated in case a resident has an emergency.

"If residents are leaving their car here, we advise that they take their valuables with them or hide them well," Williams said.

Tirella said students in the residence halls can leave most of their belongings if they want to. Each building is locked, and campus police make normal rounds of the buildings to see that everything is OK.

"To my knowledge, we've never had an incident," Tirella said.

Williams said she estimated 95 percent of tenants in the complex go home during the break. For those who stay behind, the apartment complex offers special activities such as a tree-trimming party and a finals study break.

Tirella said those wanting to stay in the residence halls over break should sign up as soon as possible. During winter break, only Haymaker and Boyd halls will be open; other halls will be completely locked. In addition, the front desks of the two halls will be staffed only part time and the dining centers will be closed, so students will be responsible for their own meals.

Tirella said she advises students to take everything they will need over break with them.

"Once the buildings are locked, there won't be anyone there to let them back in," she said.

The halls will reopen at 8 a.m. on Jan. 12.

CLINTON

At the White House, presidential aide Gregory Craig launched a sharp attack on Republicans after listening to closing arguments presented by David Schippers, the GOP's lead lawyer on the case.

"We are disappointed and saddened that the committee majority brought this solemn constitutional process down to a level of innuendo, anger and unfair, unsubstantiated charges," he said, then turned sharply and strode back into the White House.

Schippers spent nearly three hours summing up the case against the nation's 42nd president, buttressing his case with never-before-seen videotaped segments of Clinton fielding questions under oath in the Paula Jones sexual harassment case.

Schippers, a former prosecutor, said Clinton's perjury, obstruction of justice and abuse of power left lawmakers with the "sorrowful duty" of seeking his removal from office.

Earlier, Democratic lawyer Abbe Lowell had summed up for the Democrats, telling legislators, "Listen to the American people, who are asking you to find a truly bipartisan way to avoid the course you are about to undertake."

White House spokesman Joe Lockhart said the GOP charges "fall well short of impeachment," but the president's Democratic defenders expressed increasing concern about the vote on the House floor next week.

Several official sources, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Democrats laboring to gain support for censure from pivotal GOP moderate lawmakers were ready to demand a financial payment from Clinton as well as his signature on a written condemnation of his conduct.

In the last presidential impeachment drama, Richard Nixon resigned before the House could vote on articles of impeachment approved by the Judiciary Committee on a bipartisan vote.

This time, the committee is riven along partisan lines, and Clinton is fighting, not resigning.

Rep. Bob Livingston, R-La., who takes over as speaker next month, side-stepped the issue in comments to reporters, saying he didn't want to pre-judge.

"I have every intention of bringing the product of the Judiciary Committee to the floor, making sure we get to vote on it," he said.

Under the direction of Hyde, Republicans were advancing four separate articles against the president. They alleged perjury in testimony before Starr's grand jury; perjury in a civil deposition as part of the Jones lawsuits; obstruction of justice and abuse of power, both alleged to have occurred while Clinton was struggling to cover up his sexual relationship with the former White House intern.

IN CASE OF EMERGENCY...

Knowing what to expect in emergency room can make trip a little easier

STORY BY TL MEYER ■ ART BY AARON FRUEHLING

A trip to the emergency room is impossible to plan for, but knowing what to expect can make smaller emergencies much easier to deal with.

In Manhattan, Mercy Health Center has two campuses, but emergencies only are handled at the building on College Avenue, across the street from KSU Stadium, said Larry Couchman, director of emergency services for Mercy Health Center.

Students who are able to check themselves in are asked to provide their name, local address, permanent address, social security number and other information needed for identification and billing purposes, Couchman said.

He added it is helpful if students can provide some sort of insurance information to make the billing process smoother.

However, if no insurance information is available, Mercy still will provide care and figure out the insurance and payment later, Couchman said.

If the student has to be checked in by a friend, some form of identification, such as a student I.D. or driver's license eases the check-in process.

After being checked in, the student is evaluated.

If the injury or illness is serious or meets certain criteria, the student immediately is taken back to a room, and the admission process is done at a more convenient time, Couchman said.

If the student has a headache, cold or something less serious, the admission process takes place before going to a room for treatment, he said.

Another scenario that is possible is a "high census level," Couchman said. That is when most of the rooms are full. This usually happens between 5 and 10 p.m., but can occur anytime during the day.

If this happens, the nurse will evaluate the student in the waiting area and explain the situation, with the student possibly waiting in the admissions area until an open room becomes available, he said.

There are two rooms the center leaves open most of the time. One is for cardiac patients and the other for trauma. These are reserved for the most serious cases.

As for payment, Couchman said Mercy is willing to work with individuals to establish a payment plan and does not deny a patient care because of an inability to pay for services.

"Care is never withheld at this hospital," Couchman said.

Mercy's mission is to care for everyone who needs it. That is part of being a good steward of health care, said Julie Lea, director of community relations for Mercy.

Lea said Mercy works with all care providers to provide "optimum care for students."

After receiving treatment, students are encouraged to use Lafene Health Center or another primary care provider for their follow-up, Couchman said, although Mercy's emergency services can provide follow-up care.

Mercy's emergency services see between 50 and 55 patients a day, or about 18,000 a year.

Couchman said the busiest times are in September and October when people tend to be outdoors more for fall activities.

Local artists' work featured in postcard show at Varney's

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Anyone interested in seeing a little art this weekend — say, as little as a postcard — could stop by Varney's Book Store in Aggieville.

Each year, the Association of Community Arts Agencies of Kansas sponsors the Kansas Postcards Artists project, a collection of postcard-size artwork from Midwestern artists. Twenty-six pieces from the 1998 postcard series are on display through Dec. 14 at Varney's.

The series is done in a variety of artistic mediums, ranging from watercolors and acrylics to silkscreens and lithographs.

In summer 1997, the ACAAK had an open call for artwork, with the only requirements being that the artist be a Kansas resident and the size of the artwork be as small as a postcard. Artists as young as high school age were urged to enter.

This particular exhibit, which will tour cities in Kansas through August of next year, caused a lot of excitement at Varney's. Two of the artists represented in the show are from Manhattan.

Barbara Rutherford, a resident of Manhattan, has entered the ACAAK contest three times since 1994, and won a place on the postcard tour with each attempt. Rutherford's current piece, "Scrapbook of the Heart," is a collage that blends "fond moments of people and places" for her.

"I wanted to make something that was unique about me as a person from Kansas," Rutherford said. "I wanted it to show my heritage."

Lynda Andrus, assistant professor of art and area coordinator for Art for Elementary Education, is another Manhattan citizen with a piece on display. Her work, "Asian Influence," is a collage sprinkled with characters of an Asian alphabet.

Penny Cullers, art and supply manager at Varney's, said she was pleased Varney's was selected as a showcase for the exhibit. When Varney's sponsored Andrus' entry in the contest, it earned Manhattan a stop on the art tour.

"We're happy about all of the customer response we've had to the exhibit," Cullers said.

"Everyone wants to see what the local artists did."

Varney's visitors can take copies of the artwork home with them; sixteen of the original works have been reproduced in a set of postcards.

"This exhibit is part of Varney's ongoing commitment in serving the art community in Manhattan," Cullers said.

Exact copy of Hitchcock film lacks powerful intensity of 1960 original

By RYAN DOOM
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When will Hollywood learn some movies should be left alone?

The latest updated edition of a movie is a "shot-by-shot" remake of the 1960 Alfred Hitchcock classic "Psycho" by director Gus Van Sant. What's next on Hollywood's list of remakes, "Gone With the Wind" or "The Godfather"? Maybe in a few years we'll see the Olsen twins in the new version of "Titanic." But for now, we will have to indulge this one.

The original story involves a young secretary named Marion Crane (Anne Heche) who steals $400,000 from her boss in order to help her lover, Sam Loomis (Viggo Mortensen), pay off his debts. On the way to see him, she stops at the Bates Motel to stay the night during a storm.

Here, she meets the world's biggest mama's boy, Norman Bates (Vince Vaughn). Marion disappears and three people start looking for her; a private investigator (William H. Macy), her sister Lila (Julianne Moore) and Sam. After tracking her to the Bates Motel, they try to find what happened to Marion and confront Norman and his infamous mother.

Now why would Oscar-nominaed director Van Sant (Good Will Hunting) decide to remake the Hitchcock classic? He explains it as more like doing a cover of another artist's work. But don't worry, he is not attempting to put a new spin on the movie by placing it in the Old West or anything. Using the original script, musical score (though enhanced by Danny Elfman), camera angles and even Hitchcock's shooting schedule, it is clear Van Sant wanted it to be an exact copy of the original, with the addition of color.

What Van Sant failed to do, however, is capture the complete intensity the first film had. One of the problems is Vaughn in the role of Bates. Granted, trying to fill Anthony Perkins' shoes is a tough job, but Vaughn tries a little too hard to imitate his every move. His psychotic laughs seem forced and his movements seem like he is attempting to be Perkins, not Bates.

Many questions surrounded the remake of the famous shower scene. The remake didn't seem as powerful, even with the addition of red blood, nudity and a closer look at mother.

The film wasn't a total failure, though. The acting was good, and the story still manages to keep the audience glued. But as hard as Van Sant tried, he was only able to make an imitation of Hitchcock's classic — a cheap one.

Committee encourages doing service work during holiday

By SHANDA PARKER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

National holidays usually are spent relaxing from school and work, not worrying about setting the alarm clock. K-State's Martin Luther King Jr. Observance Committee is encouraging people to spend their day doing community service.

"Our theme, 'A Day On, Not a Day Off,' is based on Dr. King's philosophy of serving the community," said Keener A. Tippin II, co-chairman of the committee. "We are encouraging the K-State community, Manhattan, Junction City and Riley County to do some type of community service."

The committee suggested five service projects for people to get involved with on Jan. 18: Habitat for Humanity, Homeowners Maintenance Energy Program, Manhattan Public Housing Authority, Manhattan Emergency Shelter, and Manhattan Parks and Recreational Services.

Tippin said the group is encouraging not only the community to spend the day doing community service, but also campus organizations — the residence halls, the Greek community and departments at K-State. He said he thought they should spend the day working together on something worthwhile.

"We are trying to pull things together to emphasize for people to do more with the community," Pat Hudgins, co-chairwoman of the committee, said.

Hudgins said sign-up sheets have been circulating among the residence halls this week for 10 volunteers from each hall to sign up for service projects.

"We are not asking for the entire day; just give us at least two hours," Hudgins said. "Do something kind of cool for the day."

Hudgins said if people are interested in the projects, they should contact the Community Service Program in Edwards Hall.

The committee also is sponsoring "Hoops For Hunger Knockout Challenge" on Jan. 13 during halftime of the K-State vs. Nebraska women's basketball game. The teams will consist of news media and community all-stars. Fans are encouraged to bring non-perishable food items to the game.

Cellular-phone tower decision delayed

By GABE ECKERT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The decision on whether to build a 150-foot tower in the center of Manhattan has been postponed.

Manhattan's Board of Zoning Appeals, a five-member board appointed by the mayor, voted at its meeting Wednesday night to postpone discussion on a permit to build a cellular-phone tower near an apartment complex at 531 Sunset Ave.

The permit, submitted by Western Wireless Corp., will not be considered again until the board's Jan. 13 meeting.

Many residents near the tower's proposed site are reluctant to support it, said Dick Hayter, member of the Grandview Neighborhood Association.

"I don't feel an antenna of this magnitude is appropriate in a residential area," he said. "We are convinced there is going to be an effect on property values."

Residents also are concerned the proposed tower violates the city's zoning regulations by creating multiple commercial uses of a single piece of residential property, Hayter said.

The location on Sunset Avenue was chosen by radio-frequency engineers to maximize the tower's benefit to area cellular-phone users, Fred Simpson, Western Wireless Corp., said.

"The tower would give better handheld coverage in the downtown area, and it would increase capacity so there will be a better chance of not getting a busy signal when dialing," he said. "It would also provide increased coverage to the university."

Hayter said he also thinks the proposed tower would increase the quality of cellular-phone service, but he said many residents would prefer an alternative location for the tower.

"There are other possible sites in Manhattan that would not have the negative impact," he said.

Western Wireless Corp. is considering alternative locations to build its tower. It also is considering the possibility of constructing an antenna on an existing structure in Manhattan, such as a water tower or grain elevator, Simpson said.

6 astronauts board new space station, prepare it for permanent crew

By MARCIA DUNN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SPACE CENTER, Houston — Six astronauts jubilantly swung open the doors to the new international space station and flipped on the lights Thursday, becoming the first guests aboard the 250-mile-high outpost.

"It's fantastic. I can't say how much this means to all of us," radioed down Robert Cabana, commander of the attached shuttle Endeavour.

Mission Control replied: "You've opened the doors to a whole new era in spaceflight."

Cabana and Russia's Sergei Krikalev were the first to enter the space station. Cabana beckoned for the cosmonaut to join him in crossing the threshold of the U.S.-Russian complex. They floated in side by side.

In addition to flipping on the lights, the astronauts installed air ducts and fans and also planned to bring aboard clothes and other supplies for the first permanent crew, due to arrive in 2000.

For the five Americans and one

Russian — and hundreds of flight controllers below — it was a moment for which they and their countries had been striving for years.

The space station consists only of two rooms so far and still is more than five years from completion. Its first permanent residents — Krikalev and two other men — won't even move in for another year or so. But for the first time in nearly 25 years, NASA has a space station of its own, with people on board.

"A very significant and almost momentous event," flight director Bob Castle, said.

Unity was dark inside, and so the astronauts took along flashlights and lanterns.

"We remember when Unity was just an aluminum shell," Cabana said, admiring the spotless white and yellow walls. "It's just so nice inside. It's really nice to be in a new home."

A third and final spacewalk to wrap up work outside the station is scheduled for Saturday. The next component of the space station is due to arrive late next summer from Kazakhstan.

CLIF PALMBERG/KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN
K-State defensive back Dyshod Carter and free safety Jarrod Cooper force Oklahoma State fullback Jeremy Halferty to fumble the ball in the first quarter of K-State's 42-7 victory over the Cowboys. The Cats beat the Cowboys on Oct. 17 at KSU Stadium. Halferty recovered the fumble.

Breaking it down

When you put Purdue, K-State head-to-head, Cats seem to have edge for Alamo Bowl story by jon balmer

QUARTERBACK:

A battle of young and old. In senior Michael Bishop, the Cats have a leader who's not afraid to do anything and refuses to quit. While this hurts the team occasionally, a 43-2 record in college is tough to argue with. Combine that with 299.3 yards of total offense per game (10th in the nation), 23 passing touchdowns to four interceptions, and you've got a legitimate Heisman candidate.

Purdue counters with Drew Brees, a sophomore whose legend is just beginning. The Texas native took over the starting position this season and proceeded to set the Big Ten Conference on fire. Brees set conference records with 3,753 yards of passing and 36 touchdowns. Although Brees surrendered 17 interceptions, it's difficult to argue with the numbers. Remember, he's got two years left.

ADVANTAGE: EVEN.

RUNNING BACK:

In senior Eric Hickson, the Cats' all-time leading rusher, K-State found a steady workhorse to complement a potent passing attack. Hickson finished with 902 yards and nine touchdowns behind the lethal blocking of senior Brian Goolsby.

The only thing that kept Hickson from a 1,000 yard season was Bishop, who countered his passing with 748 yards of rushing and 14 touchdowns.

When you have a quarterback setting conference-passing records, it usually implies a weak running game. The Boilermakers only produced 10 touchdowns on the ground this season, and their leading rusher, Wichita native J. Crabtree, leads the team with 602 yards.

ADVANTAGE: CATS

WIDE RECEIVER:

Where to begin? Senior Darnell McDonald, the Cats' leading receiver, broke Kevin Lockett's school reception record with 75 and caught nine touchdowns and 1,092 yards.

The younger Lockett, Aaron, established himself with a Big 12-All Freshman team selection following a 44-reception, 928-yard season. Tight end Justin Swift only caught 23 passes his senior season, but he made them count. The Overland Park, Kan., native averaged 14.9 yards per catch.

The Boilermakers took advantage of Brees' arm with a trio of talented receivers. Senior Isaac Jones led the squad with 72 receptions, 801 yards and five touchdowns. Not far behind was junior Randall Lane with 64 receptions, 915 yards and seven TDs. Senior Gabe Cox completes the triple-threat package with 55 receptions, 647 yards and eight TDs.

ADVANTAGE: BOILERMAKERS

SECONDARY:

The Cats' achilles heel all season, the secondary was burned by Texas A&M in the Big 12 Conference title game for 324 yards and three touchdowns. However, K-State is solid at safety, led by Lamar Chapman (67 tackles) and Jarrod Cooper (86).

Outside of an uncharacteristic 396 yards of passing surrendered to Michigan State, the Boiler's secondary has kept opposing offenses from posting Purdue-like numbers through the air. Strong safety Adrian Beasley is second on the team with 64 tackles and is complemented by free safety Billy Gustin's 59 tackles and two interceptions.

ADVANTAGE: BOILERMAKERS

LINEBACKERS:

What can be said about the Cats' trio? A lot. Possibly the best trio in the nation — Jeff Kelly, Travis Ochs and Mark Simoneau — were all Butkus Award candidates and led the nation's third-rated total defense.

Simoneau led the team with 95 tackles, while Kelly chipped in 87 and six sacks.

Junior Willie Fells topped the century mark with 100 tackles for the Boilermakers, but the next closest is senior Chike Okefor with 56.

ADVANTAGE: CATS

SPECIAL TEAMS:

Often the last weapon teams think of, the Cats are loaded. Punt returner David Allen set an NCAA record with punts returned for touchdowns in three consecutive games. The sophomore also led the nation in return average with 22.1 per game.

Senior place kicker Martin Gramatica made a strong bid for a second Lou Groza award after hitting 22 field goals on 31 attempts, including an NCAA-record 65-yarder against Northern Illinois.

Purdue place kicker Travis Dorsch connected on 13 of 19 field goals this season, and junior punter Danny Rogers averaged 40.2 yards per punt, highlighted by a 63-yard punt against USC.

ADVANTAGE: CATS

COACHING:

The mastermind of the Midwest, the wizard of Wildcat land, Bill Snyder's 10-year plan nearly came full-circle this season with an 11-1 finish and Big 12 North title. With the 1998 Cats, Snyder created a well-balanced offensive attack (224.9 yards rushing, 253.6 passing) and the nation's third total defense. In only his second year in West Lafayette, Joe Tiller has gone 17-7 and produced the first back-to-back winning seasons for Purdue since 1979-80.

ADVANTAGE: CATS

Can't understand crazy bowl scenario and the mysterious BCS rankings? Follow these easy steps

With the mighty Purdue Boilermakers waiting and ready for the epic Alamo Bowl showdown Dec. 29 in San Antonio, K-State head coach Bill Snyder steadily has been preparing his squad for a battle that will be forever etched in the annals of sports history.

All right, I can't do this anymore.

There's no way I can begin to justify the bowl or the opposition that awaits the Cats. Purdue? Hey, the quarterback is great, but where do you go beyond that? Is a match between a top-5, 11-1 team and a middle-of-the-road 8-4 squad really what the public cries for? I think not.

So what can a brother do? Move on. Sure, it isn't going to be easy, but the sooner we get past our anguish the better. The team needs our support, in victory and in defeat. And while anyone can jump on the victory train, the true fans are found during the hard times.

Challenges already have been issued across the Big 12 Conference board. One Nebraska fan stated K-State fans are bandwagon material and issued the challenge to out-draw Husker fans at the Holiday Bowl. I doubt this will be any problem, considering the Big Red-necks fear the "futuristic" lifestyle of California.

The main roadblock to achieving this is the fans' disgust with K-State's bowl destination. Obviously we deserve more, but the Alamo Bowl is the hand we've been dealt, so why not embrace it?

Snyder mentioned earlier this week he was pleased with the bowl and, in light of the mishandlings of other Big 12-obligated bowls, called them "perhaps our only ally." While many players are angered and hurt by K-State's treatment, Snyder was quick to point out it wasn't aimed at the Alamo Bowl.

Basically, it would do no good to boycott the Alamo Bowl, since this isn't the source of the abuse. And in San Antonio, a city with much to offer in sightseeing as well as spirit, K-State fans quickly will forget the Dallas party that ran the town dry two years ago.

With this said, how do we voice our concern and let the nation know we're not gonna stand for the Cats' postseason treatment? There are many ways, and thanks to numerous e-mails sent by concerned K-State fans, I offer merely a couple of ways to protest the decision that left the No. 3 Bowl Championship Series team out of the new year's picture:

1. If you want to get down and dirty, change your local telephone service to something other than Southwestern Bell, the Cotton Bowl sponsor, then send it a letter stating why you are changing. Let it know you're unhappy with its choice to select a team before the Big 12 championship game even was played.

If this isn't enough, a nice boycott of Culligan Water Technologies would let the Holiday Bowl know it's not left off the list. This shouldn't be difficult, and besides, it's yet another way to beat the Huskers.

2. On the way to San Antonio by ground transportation, buy your gas 100 miles before Dallas and drive right through the city without stopping. Even better, send a message to the mayor of Dallas, Ron Kirk, and the Chamber of Commerce to let them know what you plan to do and why. If you want to avoid the town all together, Interstate 35 West goes through Fort Worth without adding much time to your trip.

Yet another shot at the Ricky Williams-loving Cotton Bowl can be had by e-mailing them at mail@swbell-cottonbowl.com. Just drop them a line to let them know you're a little upset.

3. Remember the Alamo. It's cheesy, but a big-time blowout of Purdue is the best way to start getting motivated for next season's squad.

4. Write former K-State athletic director Deloss Dodds and voice your displeasure with the Cats' treatment. If anyone should know about purple abuse, it's Dodds.

These ideas are merely the tip of the iceberg. Many more circulate through e-mail forwards and word-of-mouth. It doesn't take much to think of a retaliation, but avoiding the Alamo Bowl isn't one of them. This is a time to stand behind the Cats and take a stand even when they're not in the best of situations. If we can't rally around purple power now, what strides have we made in the program?

PERENNIAL PERFORMERS

K-State quarterback Michael Bishop runs in for a touchdown against KU on Oct. 3. Bishop has become one of the premiere rushing quarterbacks in the nation. In the Alamo Bowl, he will go face-to-face with one of the premiere passing quarterbacks in sophomore phenom Drew Brees.

Alamo to feature 2 of nation's top quarterbacks in Brees, Bishop

“HE’S AN EXTRAORDINARY
AND AN EXCELLENT ATHLETE,” DREW BREES
PURDUE QUARTERBACK

The Dec. 29 showdown between K-State and Purdue in the Alamo Bowl will not simply be a battle between two teams fighting to earn respect.

Two of the premier quarterbacks in college football will be pitted against each other. Senior Michael Bishop will attempt to ride the Boilermakers out of San Antonio, and add the final touches to his storied career at K-State.

On the flip side, Purdue sophomore Drew Brees only is beginning to rewrite the Big Ten Conference record book as he looks toward a junior campaign that could be filled with more gaudy numbers.

The Alamo Bowl contains additional significance for each player.

For Bishop, the bowl will be his chance to avenge the Cats' loss in the Big 12 Conference championship game to Texas A&M and to finish his collegiate career with an almost impeccable 43-2 record as starting quarterback.

For Brees, the opportunity awaits to put not only himself on the national college football map, but his team as well, which a win over the fourth-ranked team in the country almost certainly would accomplish.

The spotlight of this contest not only will be focused on K-State vs. Purdue, but also the intriguing matchup of two of the most talented quarterbacks in college football: Bishop vs. Brees.

Both have numbers deserving of national attention.

Going into the Alamo Bowl, Bishop has thrown for 2,844 yards and 23 touchdowns, while rushing for 748 yards and 14 touchdowns.

Bishop is also sixth in the nation in pass efficiency and 10th in total offense.

Brees paced the Boilermakers with 3,585 yards passing and 36 touchdown passes, good enough to place him atop the Big 10 record book in both categories.

Brees also set the NCAA record for attempts in a game with 83 against Wisconsin, and he tied the record for completions with 55.

Brees instantly became excited upon hearing the news he would lead the Boilermakers against K-State and Bishop, saying the Alamo Bowl will be the perfect opportunity to bring prominence to Purdue.

“I have all the respect in the world for Michael Bishop,” Brees said. “He’s an extraordinary quarterback and an excellent athlete.”

K-State has the unenviable task of facing what many college football experts are calling the next Doug Flutie. “Everybody is concerned about Brees,” senior linebacker David Conley said.

“He’s a great quarterback, and we’re all excited about playing against him.”

Bishop is the first K-State football player to be invited to the Heisman Trophy presentation. The award is presented to the nation's top player and is given out on Dec. 12. Bishop has broken several career and season records at K-State including yards rushing by a quarterback and most touchdowns by a quarterback. Myths surround Bishop and his quality arm, and it is said by some players that he has thrown a 93-yard pass during practice.

Brees, during the course of the 1998 season, set two NCAA records for single game attempts (83) and completions (55), and four Big Ten season records for attempts (516), completions (336), yards passing (3985) and touchdowns (36). He also set three single game Purdue records for yards passing (522), total yards (524) and touchdown passes (6, twice). He currently ranks ninth on the Purdue career passing list with 3985 yards.

Boilermakers shocked, pleased to be competing against No. 4, 12-1 K-State Wildcats in bowl game

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Wildcats weren't the only team to be surprised Sunday evening by the bowl announcements. The Purdue Boilermakers were in for a surprise as well.

When word came that the Boilermakers would face the No. 4 team in the nation, the players said they never imagined they would play the Cats in the Alamo Bowl on Dec. 29 in San Antonio.

“If you had told us a week ago that we were playing Kansas State, we would have said you're lying,” senior wide receiver Isaac Jones said. “Watching the game and seeing them lose, we never thought they'd end up in the Alamo Bowl!”

The 8-4 Boilermakers are unranked and stand at a position that might seem familiar to K-State fans. According to the players, Purdue is viewing the game as a possible stepping stone to show the country it is a good football team and deserves to be ranked. Senior defensive end Roosevelt Colvin said he hoped, with a win in San Antonio over the Cats, the Boilermakers could begin to get respect from the rest of the nation.

“You want to play one of the best teams and showcase your talents on national television — show the nation that Purdue is for real, that we can compete on a national level,” Colvin said. “If you're a competitor, you want to play the best. It makes it extra special to play a top-caliber team like Kansas State. Hopefully, we can come out with a victory and end up getting ranked.”

K-State will be the toughest opponent that Purdue has faced this season by far. Purdue's four losses came from USC, Notre Dame, Wisconsin and Penn State, all of which were ranked at the time.

Drew Brees, the Boilermakers' sophomore starting quarterback, had nothing but good things to say about the Wildcats. He echoed his teammates' thoughts when he said playing K-State was a good thing for the Purdue program.

“I think this is the best thing that could have happened to us,” Brees said. “I think that Kansas State is better than all those other teams. To be the best, you have to play the best.”

In his second season as head coach of the Boilermakers, Joe Tiller has made an instant effect on the program. His record over his first two seasons is the best among active Big 10 coaches at 17-7. Tiller said he knows he'll have a lot to contend with in the Cats but is very excited about the chance his football team is getting in the Alamo Bowl.

“I know they're an excellent football team — a complete football team,” Tiller said. “They have great team speed, a great offense, a great defense and maybe the best punt returner in the world.”

Free safety Lamar Chapman collapses in dejection at the end of Texas A&M's 36-33 upset over K-State in the Dr Pepper Big 12 Championship Dec. 5. The Cats hope a repeat will not occur against Purdue on Dec. 29 in the Alamo Bowl in San Antonio.

Bowl ticket sales slower than in previous years

By SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Will K-State paint San Antonio purple? It appears so, although it may take a little while for plans to finalize. A majority of fans, shocked about the lack of a first-tier bowl game after an 11-1 season, still plan to attend the Alamo Bowl Dec. 29 to support their Cats.

Tickets to the game run from $10.50 to $60.50 and can be purchased either through Ticketmaster or the K-State ticket office. The ticket office has 11,000 tickets for sale. Carol Adolph, manager of the athletic department ticket office, said it's hard to predict the numbers for this year's game.

"I think it's taken everybody by such surprise that I don't think they've gotten travel plans yet," Adolph said. "The Alumni are selling travel packages."

The KSU Alumni Association has organized travel packages which include three basic options that can be altered based on the number of people in each group. As of Monday at the end of the work day, just over 400 packages had been sold.

Karen Shafer, director of alumni communications, said they had received a large number of phone calls and anticipate that fans will still want to support the team. The Alumni Association works with various travel agencies to organize these packages and a variety of people use this service, she said.

"It's all ages, we have families that bring small children and we have our older alumni. It's a little early to tell how many packages will be purchased. I know the phones have been really busy," Shafer said.

One group that will be cheering on the Cats in San Antonio is the Catbackers. Lon Floyd, Director of Catbacker Clubs, said plans are currently underway for individual Catbacker clubs.

"Basically, each Catbacker Club will be ordering their tickets in a block so they can sit together," Floyd said. "Some of the clubs are in the process of developing plans to go as a group."

Mark Portell, president of the Catbackers of Wamego, said he had heard talk of a caravan to show Wildcat pride.

"There's talk of organizing a statewide caravan to drive through Dallas at 35 miles per hour, with everybody honking their horn and holding their finger out the window to say we're number one," Portell said.

Last year's Alamo Bowl featured then-No. 16 Purdue and No. 24 Oklahoma State, a contest the Boilermakers won 33-20 in front of a crowd of 55,552, the fourth-largest crowd in the Alamodome.

Some fans said disappointment and a lack of interest in watching K-State play unranked Purdue will prevent them from attending the game.

"There were a lot planning to go to the Fiesta Bowl, but now there's not too many planning on going," Jessica Kamphaus, sophomore in psychology, said of the Gamma Phi Beta house. "There were probably 20-25 going to the Fiesta Bowl, and maybe 10 will go to San Antonio."

While this was the sentiment of many greek houses and students in general, adamant supporters said they had faith K-State fans still believe in the Cats, and there will be a good showing in San Antonio.

"I think that, of course, everyone was disappointed that we weren't chosen for an alliance bowl game, but I think KSU fans will show their true purple color and support the team no matter what bowl game we're going to," Floyd said. "I think Kansas State University will show their class, and we will have a tremendous display of appreciation for a football team that has provided us the most exciting football season in the history of Kansas State."

Alumni Association offering travel packages

By JEFF SUTTON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Remember the Alamo. At least it might be a little easier to now.

With travel packages offered through the KSU Alumni Association and AAA Kansas-Manhattan, fans can make the trip to the Alamo Bowl on Dec. 29 with a variety of budget options.

"The real benefits are that we take care of everything," said Karen Shafer, Alumni Association director of alumni communications. "I know San Antonio is anxious to have us there."

The Alumni Association offers packages ranging from the Wildcat Economy Tour, which costs $370, to the Purple Pride Deluxe Tour, costing $956. Fans can customize their own trip, but the basic package includes a two-night hotel stay, game ticket, pregame party ticket and bus transfer rides to the pep rally, pregame party and game. The biggest package expands the stay to three nights and gives air transportation to San Antonio from Manhattan, Kansas City, Wichita or Salina.

"The best thing to do is call us and Packages can be purchased through local travel agencies, including K-State Travel Service, Creative Travel, Bryan World Travel, International Travel and Cruises and Uniglobe Knowles in Salina, Kan. The toll-free bowl hotline for the Alumni Association is 1 (800) 985-5231.

"It's not the easiest thing to get down there over the holidays," said Myra Pearson, K-State Travel Service travel agent. "So we're trying to make it as easy as possible."

Another package option for fans is through AAA Kansas-Manhattan. It includes a chartered flight from

San Antonio's night life fun, upbeat

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Although Wildcat faithful would prefer to see K-State in the Fiesta Bowl instead of the Alamo Bowl, San Antonio might be the most exciting city of the bowl venues.

"San Antonio is a great city to visit," K-State Sports Information Director Kent Brown said. "They have great restaurants and night clubs."

Playing host to more than 7 million visitors each year, this southern Texas tourist attraction has everything from historic sites to musical shows.

Known as the No. 1 tourist city in Texas, San Antonio has earned a spot on the map with such famous locations as the Alamo and the San Antonio River Walk.

"It's a very upbeat and positive atmosphere," KMAN-AM 1350 radio administrative sales assistant Jennifer Hardy said. "The River Walk is a beautiful thing to see, and it is close to several other sights, too. San Antonio really is a beautiful city."

KMAN radio, which broadcasts K-State football games on KMAN-AM 1350, KMKF-FM 101.5 and KXBZ-FM 104.7, is setting up location at Polly Esther's.

The station will be host to Powercat Gameday on Sunday, Monday and Tuesday during the Alamo Bowl weekend at the new dance club. The club, along with several other restaurants and bars, is near the scenic River Walk area.

Polly Esther's, which has three levels — a dance club, culture club and restaurant — will be providing a special K-State buffet for Wildcat travelers on Sunday and Monday from 4 to 7 p.m.

"We're excited about it," Hardy said. "I'm curious to see what it looks like. It sounds fun."

Last year, KMAN was host to K-State travelers at McDuffey's in Tempe, Ariz., for the Fiesta Bowl. With an estimated 50,000 K-State fans invading the desert, McDuffey's experienced record business during that weekend, more than it ever had in the bar's nine-year history.

With legions of K-State fans supporting the Wildcats for out-of-town games, Hardy she expects a lot of people to hang out at Polly Esther's.

"We have always had a good response from the fans," she said. "We have never had a bad out-of-town atmosphere."

In addition to Polly Esther's and the River Walk, San Antonio has other interesting attractions, including the world-famous San Antonio Symphony, Brackenridge Park and the Witte Museum.

Other restaurants in San Antonio include La Fogata for Mexican cuisine, Jazz for cajun food and the Josephine Steak House.

For animal lovers, the San Antonio Zoo has one of the largest animal collections in the United States with more than 3,000 animals representing 700 species.

With more than three centuries of tradition, Brown said San Antonio is a great travel destination for K-State fans.

"It's a great place for tourists," Brown said. "There are a lot of positives to this situation."

Shock of Alamo hits merchants

By AMANDA LEVIN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Local merchants, like K-State students, were not prepared for the aftermath of Saturday's bowl selection.

"We had designs made for the Fiesta Bowl or the Sugar Bowl," said Becky Ballard, manager of Ballard's Sporting Goods. "We were not ready for the Alamo Bowl."

Ballard's was prepared for a national-championship or a Bowl Alliance game, Ballard said. The store will not be carrying as many bowl products as it had anticipated but still expects good sales from Wildcat fans. Ballard's does have some Alamo Bowl T-shirts available, and Ballard said the rest of the bowl attire will arrive today.

"We made one T-shirt to reflect the feeling of most K-State fans: 'When the heartache fades away, Purple Pride is here to stay,'" Ballard said.

Steve Levin, assistant manager of Varney's Book Store, said he also had to switch gears in ordering merchandise and redesigning bowl T-shirts.

"I had talked to other merchants in towns where they have had national championships, and the sales and interest of the community are extremely high, so that is what we had prepared for," Levin said.

"We made a lot of changes in quantity and designs of bowl merchandise early Monday morning."

Varney's will join KMAN, K-Rock and B-104 in San Antonio for the bowl, Levin said. The store's headquarters will be at Polyesters, a new restaurant and bar in San Antonio. Varney's and some local merchants on the Riverwalk will be selling K-State and bowl merchandise leading up to the Dec. 29 game, starting on Dec. 27.

"Once everyone gets over the initial letdown, I think they will be in to get bowl T-shirts and get excited about backing the Cats in the Alamo Bowl," Levin said. "We have been given a lemon; all we can do is make it into lemonade."

Varney's is expecting bowl T-shirts and apparel to start arriving by the end of this week.

Although a game ticket is not included in the package, fans also can receive a package that includes only air travel, which is $399.

Both agencies are encouraging fans to make their reservations as soon as possible as options begin to fill.

Committee will consider Library privilege fee

By JOE HURLA
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A proposal requesting a student privilege fee increase of about two dollars per credit hour to help fund Hale Library will be sent to the Student Senate Privilege Fee Committee in the next week, Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock said Wednesday.

If approved, the proposal would generate approximately $760,000 annually, which Hobrock said would be spent on library materials that would be useful to the average student.

But Hobrock said it was important to remember approval is far from a foregone conclusion. Before this idea becomes a reality, it will have to pass through the privilege fee committee and then either be approved by the entire Senate or by the student body in a referendum.

Hobrock said a referendum is a definite possibility. He said he has been in contact with members of the Senate, and they have expressed an interest in seeing the students vote on the library's proposal.

"It is their intention that it will eventually land at a referendum," Hobrock said. "We're forming a grass-roots steering committee to make our case to students."

Hobrock has not yet revealed the names of the steering committee members, but said he would as soon as the proposal was sent to the Senate. He said it was important to tell the students everything, since they would be deciding the outcome of the proposal.

"We might as well be upfront about it since we're going back to the table to ask students to participate in the funding," Hobrock said.

One person who will be important in the proposal's journey toward a referendum is Privilege Fee Chairman Jeff Meder, junior in finance. Meder has been in direct contact with Hobrock to discuss the proposal, and said that while he can't predict what will become of the proposal, he does know what he would prefer.

"My intent is to send it to referendum," Meder said. "So far, we've just tossed it around, but that's what I'd like to see. For now, I'm just trying to guide him through the process and keep everyone abreast of what's going on."

Senate Chairman Gabe Eckert said he isn't ready to have the students vote on the proposal. He said the Senate will definitely spend some time scrutinizing the proposal before making any kind of decision, including a decision to send it to a student vote.

"We're a long ways away from that," Eckert said. "We'll look at this much more closely, and then try to decide what is the best long-term solution for students."

"We'll have to ask ourselves several questions. Is it necessary? Is it something students can and are willing to pay for?" he said.

Hobrock said it is something students can afford, and he wants to convince them they should also be willing to chip in.

Convincing students to pay will be difficult, Hobrock said. To persuade them, he said he would commit student fees to buying materials that will be valuable resources for typical students, instead of scholarly journals that most students will not use.

"We're going to make a deal with students to try to meet their needs, and we're going to be aggressive about it," Hobrock said. "Without the funding we want, we're reduced to our wits, and we're forced to try to put together pieces that add up."

Last year Hobrock said he didn't have all of the pieces to work with. Proposals for a student privilege fee to support the library surfaced twice in the Senate. One failed to pass from the privilege fee committee, and the other was defeated by the Senate body. Those proposals requested less money than the current one, about 85 cents per credit hour.

Hobrock said that even though those proposals failed, he is optimistic about the new one. He said there is a national trend towards students paying for the facilities they use, and hopes K-State will continue that trend.

"Everyone is sensitive about costs, but our current political climate is moving more towards user fees," Hobrock said. "We're trying to be creatively financed, but it's difficult without any help from the students."

Hobrock said he doesn't expect any decision on the proposal for several more months. While he said he's not sure exactly how long it will be before anything is decided, he said he hopes to have it done in time for the April Kansas Board of Regents meeting.

The contest, which raised money for the Flint Hills Breadbasket, was part of the events planned for the Martin Luther King Jr. observance. Doehling and Collegian staff member Todd Stewart were winners in the event's two divisions, public figures and media personalities.

Larisa Combs, a disc jockey for the KMKF 101.5 FM morning show, bows out of line after she was knocked out during Hoops for Hunger at halftime of the women's basketball game Wednesday night in Bramlage Coliseum.

HOOPS for HUNGER

Media, K-State personalities help Breadbasket as part of King observance

A basketball shootout is how the Flint Hills Breadbasket is going to start restocking their shelves after the holiday season.

Hoops for Hunger, a benefit for the Breadbasket, was created this year as a way for people to get involved in community service without needing to put forth any extra effort. The benefit was part of the events planned for the Martin Luther King Jr. Observance.

"We wanted to create something to get people to help, but also making it interesting for people to see or attend," Pat Hudgins, co-chair of the Martin Luther King Jr. Observance Committee, said.

The benefit took place last night in Bramlage Coliseum during halftime of the K-State vs. Nebraska women's basketball game. Celebrities from the local media played against those from the community, and spectators were requested to bring nonperishable food items to the game.

Shirley Bramhall, director of the Flint Hills Breadbasket, said 3,300 pounds of food had been collected for Hoops for Hunger before the game. Groups sent donations in after hearing about the event from local media personalities.

"During the winter months when electricity bills are higher, it puts a lot of demands on families that normally are not there," Bramhall said. "Our families are very grateful for what the community does."

Participants included celebrities from the university, city officials and radio and television personalities.

"The Manhattan community always works together when it needs to such as in Desert Storm, the Flood of '93 and for a good cause like the Breadbasket," Mayor Steve Hall, said.

The event begins the Martin Luther King Jr. Observance for K-State. By doing this kind of community service, participants felt it was a way of honoring King.

"It makes sense to do this because it is promoting community involvement which ties into Dr. King's main goals," Caroline Tetschner, KKSU radio personality, said.

Students also felt that having local celebrities and personalities in Hoops for Hunger emphasized the need for community service.

"People always think about service during the holidays, but it is also good to think about all year," Trudy Terpening, senior in elementary education, said. "This gets people involved and aware of everything going on in the community."

Bill Kennedy, Riley County Attorney, said by helping the community, another problem could be solved indirectly.

"I honestly believe that if we can beat hunger, we can help beat crime," Kennedy said.

Todd Stewart of the Collegian and John Doehling from the Riley County Police Department won the contest.

Graves' budget plans fall short of Regents', university's requests

By KELLE MILLER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Gov. Bill Graves' budget proposal of an average 4.7-percent increase in faculty salaries is a step in the right direction, President Jon Wefald said Wednesday.

The 4.7 percent means an extra $2.5 million to enhance faculty salaries.

"Faculty are a unique group in Kansas — they are the heart and soul of the university," Wefald said. "We are pleased they have separated the regents faculty out by giving them this pool of money."

Wefald's office won't take the proposal lying down. Sue Peterson, assistant to the president for governmental relations, said she still will lobby for the regents' recommended 7.6-percent increase in the legislature. Peterson agreed with Wefald that the proposed 4.7-percent increase will not help make K-State's faculty salaries competitive.

"It doesn't help close the gap," Peterson said. Wefald said K-State has been falling behind on faculty salaries for years. In order to sustain the good things happening at K-State, he said the university must retain its best faculty and recruit the best faculty. He said that is difficult with low salaries.

If the 7.6-percent increase isn't adopted, Wefald said regents schools will have to ask for a bigger increase next year. Wefald said he agreed with the Regents' recommended plan and felt that it would take those three years to request for salary funding. "We are 18 or 19 percent behind our peer institutions — Colorado State, Iowa State, North Carolina State, Oregon State and Oklahoma State," Wefald said. "The 4.7 percent is short to eliminate that gap."

Wefald said he appreciates that

Investigation continues into intruder's shooting death

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A masked intruder was fatally shot and another injured on Jan. 5 after they broke into a home occupied by three K-State students and an alumnus, police said.

More than a week after the apparently botched burglary, police said witnesses' stories differ, and they won't release who fired the fatal shots from a handgun registered to one of the students.

Riley County Police Department Sgt. Jay Mills said the motive and sequence of events are still under investigation. He said both men were apparently shot with a small caliber handgun, like a .22.

Ralph E. Thomas III, 25, 1997 K-State alumnus, and Emily L. Dossett, 21, sophomore in elementary education, were inside the house along with Richard B. Jones, 24, senior in business, and Nathan L. Fox, 24, junior in psychology, both of whom live at 711 N. Juliette Ave.

Thomas said he and Fox were in the living room and Jones and Dossett were in a back room when a knock came at the front door.

When Fox opened the door, Thomas said three men in ski masks, at least two carrying guns, came in and forced him and Fox to the floor.

Thomas said Jones looked out from the rear of the home, saw the men, ducked back into his room and came out with his own handgun.

Thomas said he didn't remember all the details of what happened next. Jones and the intruders began yelling at one another, and shots were fired, he said.

VIEWPOINT

KRONER, Kan. — Did you watch FOX's "The X-Files" on Sunday?

The show took place here, in Kroner, Kan. — just a short, fictitious drive from Manhattan and the K-State campus.

Agents Fox Mulder and Dana Scully were investigating weather phenomena that were killing crops, people and cows. Once, Mulder watched as a cow was lifted by tornado and deposited inside his motel room.

A deranged amputee claimed he was responsible

Varney's expands to fill Campus Theatre vacancy

The movie screen and seats are gone from the old Campus Theatre, and soon Varney's Book Store will move in.

Varney's store owner, Jon Levin, acquired the theater Dec. 16 and said he plans to expand the textbook department into the space.

Levin said the expansion was needed and the theater's location made it about the only option he had. The purchase will almost double the store space and will allow for better service to the students and more space for better presentation, he said.

Levin said he understands the historical aspect of the theater, which began serving students in 1926, and the history will be considered during plans for construction.

"We want to be sensitive to design criteria and the historical aspect of Aggieville," he said. "We think that it's not just a landmark for Aggieville but also for Manhattan."

Levin said he will keep the marquee but there might be some small changes. There also are plans to add a second floor to the theater space.

Levin said community members have congratulated him on the purchase and are glad the old theater will be used.

Katie Crawford, sophomore in construction science and management, said she thinks Varney's needs the space, and it will make the task of finding textbooks easier. She also said she is glad the space is being used.

"I think it's good somebody is going to use the theater, but it's sad to see it gone," she said.

Crawford said she thinks the historical aspect should be remembered during plans.

"I think they should leave the nostalgic feel," she said.

Levin said plans have begun and he expects construction to be completed sometime next October.
